Late in 1920 the communist coterie at Moscow decided to launch a new movement in America to capture the trade-unions. Their effort through their political branches to bring about an uprising in conjunction with the steel strike in 1919, and the "outlaw" switchmen's strike in 1920, had resulted in failure. Samuel Gompers, with stinging denunciation, had driven back the wave of communism in the unions. In only one industry, the so-called needle trades, had the communist movement met with any degree of success, but these organizations were isolated from the rest of the labor movement.

It was therefore manifest that victory in America could not be achieved solely through the mediumship of the existing communist political units. A readjustment was necessary, and it was made. A separate organization, fashioned as a national labor movement, intended to work within the unions as a part of them—employing the process of "boring from within"—was put into the field. Samuel Gompers, they hoped, would be overwhelmed by it, for it was apparent that with his unyielding opposition the American Federation of Labor could never be seized or controlled by them as long as he remained in it.

With these objects in view, Zinoviev, Losowsky, and Lenin proceeded during the next 12 months to organize the Trade Union Educational League. This project was put under the control of, and made amenable as far as its work was concerned, to the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America, and it remains so to-day. William Z. Foster was selected to lead this movement. In the spring of 1921 he went to Russia, and the understanding was that he went there to get his instructions for the organization of the Trade Union Educational League, gather facts about the communist work in Soviet Russia, the functioning of communist ideas and theories, and learn how the officials of the Communist International wanted these ideas and theories applied in America through the Trade Union Educational League.

In Moscow Foster was officially designated, according to Lenin's confidential messages to the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America, to lead the new "boring from within" movement in America. Their object was twofold. The communist "drive" against the labor unions in America would be fortified and strengthened, and they would be put on a more practical and effective basis for taking advantage of a coal strike, if it took place in the spring, to bring about "the armed insurrection" than they had been in the steel and switchmen's strike.

Foster began to exploit the Trade Union Educational League immediately on his return in November, 1921, saying that its purpose was to "assist in hastening the natural evolution of the labor movement from a craft to an industrial basis." He said that the purpose of his new venture was to lay the foundation for the reorganization of all labor unions into an industrial "one big union."

Foster called his first meeting of the Trade Union Educational League in Chicago on October 31, 1921, and there presented the mandate of the Red Trade Labor Union International, empowering him to form "a strong political revolutionary union in the United States, promoted through the agency of the shop steward committees." This plan is diametrically opposed to the policy of the American labor movement. His activity, he said, would not be confined to general communist propaganda, but to "special work in the formation of the activities of the American section of the Red Trade Labor Union International." He announced that he would launch a new revolutionary publication in the English language to aid him in his work.

Foster's first official announcement, a revolutionary document attacking the craft union idea, and calling for the formation of a new movement to supplant existing craft unions with "industrial" unions, or a "one big union," was issued on February 10, 1922. One week later Foster issued a second letter, with a "Call to action." He said that existing unionism is obsolete and backward, and that "militants must definitely and finally rid themselves of the dual union secessional movement that has negated their efforts for so long," and further, that "they must thoroughly organize themselves within the trade-unions for the effective application of their boundless energies and dynamic programs." He said that the Trade Union Educational League proposed to develop craft unions from "their present antiquated and stagnant condition into modern, powerful labor organizations capable of waging successful warfare against capital."

When the miners' strike started on April 1, 1922, Foster and his coterie were ready to inject themselves into the situation and start their "militant" campaign as it had been outlined in Moscow, and developed in detail by himself and the communist organization in this country. Foster was now the great industrial organizer of the communist movement in America, with direct connection and contacts with the Communist International and its field general in command of the campaign to capture the American unions.

Loyal assistance was forthcoming from the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America. Instructions sent out on the eve of the coal strike were:

"In view of the threatened strike of the miners, the central executive committee has worked out the following plan of activity for the organization: The national industrial organizer has been placed in complete charge of all phases of the coal situation. He is to utilize to the fullest extent all his open connections in the union with the view of uniting all the left elements for coordinated support of the miners in the event of a strike. In this emergency the national industrial organizer has authority to appoint assistants without waiting for the confirmation of the CEC (central executive committee). All party channels are at the disposal of the industrial organizer for this purpose. All district organizers must carry out instructions without delay. Through our legal organ we will wage a campaign to win the railroad workers to the idea of refusing to carry scab coal. Throughout the struggle all our papers in No. 1 (Communist Party) and No. 2 (Workers Party) will be kept fully informed of the activities and developments of the situation. The national industrial organizer is preparing a leaflet and a detailed plan of operation for all our nuclei."

As a means of facilitating their campaign in the coal regions the communists divided the country into two sections. The eastern section, with headquarters at New York, included the anthracite region in eastern Pennsylvania and the bituminous fields in the remainder of the State, as well as the coal fields of Maryland, West Virginia, southeastern Ohio, and eastern Kentucky.

The western district covered the coal fields of Illinois, Indiana, and northern and central Ohio. Headquarters were at Chicago.

Major headquarters for general supervision of the strike work in these districts were maintained both at Chicago, the home of Foster, and at Cleveland, the home town of C. E. Ruthenburg, executive secretary of the Workers Party of America.

Agents from New York and Chicago, as well as Cleveland, poured into the coal fields. The New York headquarters was located in the national offices of the Workers Party of America, and specifically in the office of Carlo Tresca, anarcho-communist and political refugee from Italy, who was sentenced to the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta for violation of war time laws. Tresca was the "field supervisor," who executed the "boring from within" plans in the eastern district as they came to him from the communist "inner circle."

Cooperating with him and giving him all possible assistance were James P. Cannon, chieftain of the Workers Party of America and member of the "inner circle" of both the Workers and Communist Parties; William F. Kruse, assistant secretary of the Workers Party of America and dominating factor in the Friends of Soviet Russia; J. Lewis Engdahl, editor of the Worker, one of the official communist organs; Ludwig Lore, member of the executive committees of both communist parties and one of the interlocking links between them, as well as editor of the revolutionary Volks Zeitung at New York.

Cannon, whose party alias is "Cook," was in constant communication with the agents sent into both the eastern and the western districts. Lore, or "Young," provided much of the propaganda that was circulated in these districts.

Southwestern Pennsylvania from the very start was the center of the strike whirlpool. The affected area here extended from Pittsburgh and Johnstown on the north to Fairmont and Wellsburg, W. Va., and Bellaire, Ohio, on the south and west.

The Chicago headquarters were largely under the direction of John Carney, editor of the communist organ, Voice of Labor, and his business manager, Nick Dozenburg, as well as Arne Swabeck, a member of the central executive committee of the Communist Party.

Assisting them and acting as their chief field agents were T. R. Sullivan, communist organizer at St. Louis; Norman Tallentire, a communist organizer at Chicago; and Gus Fraenckel, an agent working among switchmen and railway employees in the Chicago district. Swabeck, Sullivan, and Tallentire were later arrested in the raid on the communist convention at Bridgman, Mich.

At about the time the strike started, Peter Poscal Cosgrove, of Boston, a well-known communist agent, returned from Russia, saying that he had arranged with Lenin for the organization of the miners of America on communist "one big union" lines, and that he would cooperate with Foster to this end.

Immediately after Cosgrove's return, James P. Cannon joined Alfred Wagenknecht, alias "Martin," alias "Duffy," member of the executive committee of the Workers Party and alleged correspondent for communist newspapers, who was recently expelled from the anthracite miners' convention at Scranton, Pa., and both of them departed for Russia for further conference with Lenin and his associates.

Jay Lovestone, alias "L. C. Wheat," executive secretary of the Communist Party of America, went to Berlin to get funds for strike promotion purposes that had been left there by Russian agents.

As the communist emissaries from New York swarmed into the coal fields of Pennsylvania, they attempted to gain the confidence of the officials of the union and to ascertain their plans for the conduct and management of the strike. In a number of instances they succeeded in this purpose, and did make their way into the councils of local groups of the union, a situation which afforded enemies of the union an excuse for unjustly charging against it all of the crime and disorder which followed.

Everywhere that they went violence, disorder, and trouble, clashes with the police, dynamiting, incendiary fires, and injured and maimed men were left in their wake.

The New York Volks Zeitung, in its issue of April 10, said:

"Right after the outbreak of the strike in the textile and coal industries the Workers Party sent its most able organizers into the strike zone to carry on their work in the sense of the party principles. Three district organizers, 5, 6, and 10, dedicate their entire energy to this task."

William F. Dunne, labor editor of the Worker, went into the Pittsburgh and Ohio regions as the chief emissary of the New York headquarters. Dunne carefully and closely examined the field and looked for the weak points in the ranks of the miners that were most susceptible to attack by the communists. Dunne made a tour through Pennsylvania and Ohio, uttering inflammatory speeches as he went, and rendering confidential reports to the higher communist officials of his work and of the conditions that he found.

In the raid conducted recently by Prosecuting Attorney Gardiner and Assistant Prosecuting Attorney Myers, of Pittsburgh, on the headquarters of Fred Merrick, duplicate copies of the reports sent by Dunne to New York were uncovered. These documents are now in the possession of Mr. Gardiner. Merrick is under indictment for violation of the Pennsylvania antisedition act, and at liberty under bail of $10,000. While in Pittsburgh, Dunne occupied the same living quarters with Merrick and made use of the facilities of the Workers' Party district office.

Soon after arriving at Pittsburgh, Dunne said that he, Merrick, and other leaders of the Communist and Workers' Parties felt that the effort to organize the southwestern Pennsylvania coal fields "was being made not because of the efforts of the officials of the United Mine Workers of America, but in spite of them."

He said that while matters continued to progress as they were then doing, he and the other organizers of the Communist and Workers' Parties would not interfere in any way, or concentrate very much on the mine workers, but that as soon as the organizers of the United Mine Workers of America had completed their work there an intensive campaign would be started in the ranks of the miners' union to spread the strike to other industries.

"Naturally, as soon as this campaign is under way, more speakers will be brought in," said Dunne. "The officials of the United Mine Workers of America are being watched very closely for any treacherous action on their part toward the rank and file, and should any such action be attempted they will immediately be exposed."

Tresca made his appearance in the region on May 6, when the strike was one month old. Soon after the coming of Tresca and his associate, Emilia Coda, violence started on a major scale. Miners' houses were dynamited; power transmission lines were blown up; highways were mined with bombs, and automobiles were blown to fragments. One small car was reduced to splinters by a bomb hidden under a bridge, but the occupants escaped with slight injuries. Reports of threatened dynamitings were a daily occurrence. Families of mine officials and workers alike lived in constant terror. A state of hysteria and terriorism spread over the strike region.

The communists concentrated their activities in the vicinity of Uniontown, New Salem, Brownsville, Charleroi, and Avella. In the center of this district is the so-called coke region, where practically all of the mine workers were foreign born or aliens.

From their stronghold at Avella, and cooperating with the communist group at Bellaire, Ohio, these communists engineered the raid in July on the nonunion mine at Cliftonville, near Wellsburg, W. Va., in which lives of the sheriff and a number of their own men were lost. Previous to this raid plans for its execution were made by the communist agents at Avella, Canonsburg, and Pittsburgh. This occurrence was one of the outbreaks through which the communists expected to take possession of the strike, spread it to other industries, and bring about a general "armed uprising."

The American Civil Liberties Union, acting on the pretext that "free speech, free press, and civil liberty" was menaced by the efforts to suppress the violence, disorder, and trouble stirred up by the communist agitators, sent a delegation of its own to southwestern Pennsylvania to also "work from within" the strike. This organization proclaimed that it was exerting its efforts in behalf of the United Mine Workers of America, and that it was trying to help "win the strike." Records seized by District Attorney Gardiner in Merrick's office at Pittsburgh include an extended correspondence between Merrick and Roger Baldwin, directing secretary of the American Civil Liberties Union. This correspondence reveals that the principal effort of the American Civil Liberties Union in this section was to provide legal means for obtaining police permits for street meetings at which communist speakers would appear, and under the guise of assisting the miners' strike spread their communist propaganda and revolutionary doctrines.

The relations between Baldwin and Merrick are shown to have been intimate and friendly. Not only were the communist problems of the district discussed in their letters to each other but there is also frequent reference to the activities of Baldwin and of the American Civil Liberties Union in the correspondence that passed at that time between Merrick on the one hand, and William Z. Foster, James P. Cannon, William F. Kruse, H. E. Keas, C. E. Ruthenburg, Charles Baker, and a dozen others of the most active of the communist and revolutionary agents who were connected with the scheme of "boring from within" the strike.

The American Civil Liberties Union is shown by the correspondence at the time to have been concerned primarily in keeping the communist agents out of the jails and prisons of southwestern Pennsylvania after they were sent in there by the revolutionary organization in this country.

Careful scrutiny of the letters that passed between the communist agents and their superior officers in New York does not in any single instance show where they sought to establish an open or frank contact with an official of the United Mine Workers. On the other hand, these letters furnish adequate evidence that when they did establish contacts with union officials it was for the purpose either of inveigling them into the communist movement or placing them in a compromising status where suspicion and distrust of them and of the union could be aroused in the minds of the rank and file of the miners and they be forced to relinquish their positions.

The communist group in this region constituted an "inner circle" working in accordance with instructions from Lenin and Zenoviev to seize control of the strike and to make certain that there was no settlement until the officials of the union were thrown out; the trouble spread into other industries, and a general uprising of workers precipitated throughout the country.

In the next article of the exposé of the communist revolutionary movement in America the United Mine Workers will reveal the conspiracy that brought about the uprising in Herrin, Ill., resulting in the death of more than a score of men.

ARTICLE III

The United Mine Workers of America, in continuing the revelations of the communist revolutionary movement in America as it relates to the miners' union and other labor organizations, presents here the facts in the conspiracy which caused the loss of the lives of 22 men at Herrin, Ill., on June 21, 1922.

The United Mine Workers of America, as an organization, has been mercilessly attacked and condemned for the Herrin massacre when, in fact, the miners' union was in no manner responsible for what took place. This revolting, inexcusable, terrible crime was fomented, promoted, and caused solely by communists. It was a carefully planned affair, schemed with all of the diabolic cruelty and disregard for law that characterizes the activities of the communist movement.

Participating in the events which led to the slaughter of these men were 67 members—virtually all of them of Lithuanian nationality—of the local chapter, in the town of Herrin, of the Communist Party of America, together with 19 other communist agents and organizers, who had been sent in from Chicago by the communist organization for the purpose of arousing the local communists and precipitating an attack upon the strip mine of the Southern Illinois Coal Co.

All of the 67 local communists, as well as the 19 imported agents, were members of what is known as the Bolshevik Lithuanian branch of the Communist Party of America. They accept the decisions of the Communist International, proclaim allegiance to the Communist Party of America, and adhere to its mandates and party principles.

For more than seven weeks preparations had been in progress in Franklin and Williamson Counties, in southern Illinois, to bring about the attack upon the strike breakers and armed guards who were at the strip mine after the coal strike started on April 1. Violence, disorder, and trouble were rampant in southwestern Pennsylvania. Communist groups in New York, Cleveland, and Chicago were active in their efforts to cause the strike in southwestern Pennsylvania to expand and grow into a great revolutionary movement, in which the original causes for the cessation of work in the mines would be lost sight of, and an armed insurrection, having for its purpose the establishment of a Bolshevik régime or dictatorship in this country, and enforced recognition of the Russian dictatorship and the Communist International would be brought about.

The plan was to have simultaneous uprisings in southern Illinois and, if possible, in the vicinity of Bellaire, Ohio, which was also a hotbed of communist agitation and propaganda, and in the region surrounding Uniontown, Pa.

A telegram sent to the local union officials at Herrin by President John L. Lewis, of the United Mine Workers, placing the workers of the strip mines in the category of "strike breakers" was shrewdly twisted and distorted, according to the boast of the communist leaders at Chicago, into an "invitation" to attack the strip mines and the workmen employed there.

Officials of the United Mine Workers had no intimation that an attack upon the strip mines was contemplated or that a conspiracy within the Communist Party of America existed at the time to precipitate a tragedy such as took place on the day after the telegram of President Lewis was received.

Headquarters for the participation of the communists in the miners' strike in Illinois, Indiana, and northern and central Ohio was at Chicago.

William Z. Foster was the dominating figure in the situation. Through the medium of the strike he proposed to gain a strong foothold in the miners' union for the recently organized Trade Union Educational League, and to convert the miners' union into a "one big union" center around which would gradually be mobilized the trade-unions of America, reorganized in accordance with this idea.

Foster's right-hand men in the movement in Illinois were Earl Browder, editor of his official organ; Thomas R. Sullivan, communist organizer at St. Louis; and Norman Tallentire, a communist organizer at Chicago.

Jack Carney, editor of the revolutionary Voice of Labor at Chicago, and his business manager, Nick Dozenburg, were active figures in the organization. The chief field agent was Arne Swabeck, member of the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America, while other agitators associated with the "boring from within" work in the strike were Oscar Larson, of the Young Communist League; Nels Kjar, who had been convicted in the Cook County courts for conspiring against the Government and the country during the war; Gus Fraenckel, an agent among the railway employees; and Charles Krumbein, a district official of the communists.

Carney was instrumental in the preparation and printing of communist circulars and dodgers for distribution in the strike region and designed to undermine the leaders of the miners' union and throw the organization into the hands of the communists.

The program was not confined to Chicago—it was the program of the Communist Party all over America. For two years the communists had searched for a way to seize control of the miners' organization, and the strike was being taken advantage of as the supreme opportunity in this direction. If they succeeded, the miners' union would become the foremost revolutionary agency in the country and "militancy" among labor unions for the overthrow of the Government would become an established fact.

Foster and his group, through the Trade Union Educational League, adopted the policy of urging the miners to resist any settlement of the strike by the recognized leaders of the union and to spread propaganda and misleading information through the ranks of organized labor that President Lewis and his associates were engaged in a deep-laid scheme to betray the members of the miners' union.

At the same time all communist agents were actively working to expand the strike into a revolutionary uprising, starting in a few localities and gradually spreading to other labor unions and developing into a nation-wide outbreak of organized labor.

Such was the Herrin affair, and such was the purpose behind it.

On April 4, 1922, Swabeck mailed from the office of the Voice of Labor, in Chicago, 60,000 copies of the inflammatory leaflet, Miners, Strike to Win. Throughout this strike this office was one of the major points from which the communist campaign among the miners in southern Illinois was carried on.

Swabeck went personally into Franklin and Williamson Counties, visiting the towns of Christopher, Zeigler, Sesser, Marion, Herrin, and other points where large numbers of miners were idle.

In Franklin County he was joined by Sullivan, of St. Louis, and Tallentire and Fraenckel, of Chicago, as well as other individuals who had been imported to spread communist propaganda among the miners.

Early in May the boast was made in the office of the Voice of Labor that the Illinois coal fields would soon be dominated by the members of the Communist Party, as the membership of the United Mine Workers was being steadily fed with communist propaganda and it was bearing fruit. Many communist groups had been started among the miners, it was stated, and all of them were acting in the capacity of recruiting units for the "illegal" or Communist Party.

The intent of the communists in the strike was established in a meeting under the auspices of the Workers Party of America in the Ashland Auditorium, at Chicago, on March 26, where Swabeck and Krambein were the speakers. Swabeck said that "armed insurrection will be forced upon the workers to use in this strike." Krumbein asserted that "solidarity" would be used as the motto of the communists in the coal strike. Solidarity as used by the Communist International and the Communist Party of America means "mass action for revolutionary purposes."

Kjar's task was to mobilize the various organizers and agitators of the Communist Party for work among the miners. In this he was assisted by Krumbein and Larson.

Carney went into southern Illinois about May 20, posing as a correspondent of the Federated Press, but for the real purpose of urging the miners there not to make a separate agreement with the operators until, as he said, a complete settlement of the strike could be affected. The aim of the communists was to keep the strike going until their seeds of revolution could sprout sufficiently to prevent any settlement of the strike being reached.

Another agent of the communists who went into southern Illinois was Browder, who, in a speech at a communist gathering in Christopher early in May, accused the officials of the miners' union and the American Federation of Labor of treachery. He said that "the miners' salvation is in an organization which will be unified with all the industrial workers of the world, and aiming at social revolution and the workers' republic." Browder was followed on the stage by Sullivan, who made a speech for solidarity, and urged the miners to become members of the revolutionary parties.

This agitation under the active efforts of the communists continued during May and June. The strike area in southern Illinois was carefully examined, and the points where riot, violence, or armed insurrection might be started were charted and catalogued. In the list of these places were Christopher, Zeigler, Sesser, and Herrin.

Continuation of work in the strip mine at Herrin had been a source of irritation to the striking miners in that vicinity. The communist agents were quick to realize this situation and to seize upon it as a means of propagating their doctrines and increasing their influence with the idle miners.

With the local Lithuanian miners as a nuclei, a Communist Party chapter was organized in Herrin, holding its meetings secretly in the Lithuanian language, but taking its instructions from the agents of Dozenburg in the office of Carney at Chicago. Quietly and stealthily they worked among the idle miners at Herrin, preaching insurrection and armed attack upon the strip mine, where coal was being produced.

Swabeck and Fraenckel were spending most of their time in the vicinity of Herrin, returning to Chicago each week end for conferences with the communist leaders there.

In June a query as to the status of the men employed in the strip mine was made President Lewis. He replied to this query, classifying the situation as one of strike breaking. This telegram was immediately pounced upon by the communist agents in the vicinity and distorted into an excuse for an armed attack upon the strip mine.

The workers there were captured, and under the leadership of the 19 communist agents who, according to Dozenburg, had been imported for the purpose of starting armed insurrection and revolution, the men were shot down.

It is certain that there always will be some form of organization of labor in America. Employers may well ask themselves whether they would prefer to deal and negotiate with labor in its present organized form or with labor organized and controlled by those who are capable of doing what was done at Herrin.

That night and the next day there was rejoicing in the office of the Voice of Labor in Chicago. The armed insurrection that had been carefully planned was at hand—it had actually started. Dozenburg proclaimed that the new communists at Herrin had proven that they were real communists, and that now the revolutionary work must be spread to Indiana and Ohio.

Very clever tactics had been used by communists in assisting rioters, and the next step must be to shift responsibility from the men who committed the crime and put it "on the slain men," and to prevent the punishment of any of the men who were implicated in the massacre.

Dozenburg expressed confidence that no one would be punished for the crime, for the communist grip was strong in Herrin, and "our people working among the miners used clever tactics in assisting them and are using the party tactics to influence the public officials."

"Our great advantage is," said Dozenburg, "that the head of the mine workers, Lewis, sent a telegram there. This was used as an opportunity by our people by which they easily could be covered in their action."

Dozenburg then went to the center of the affair.

"We have 67 members of the Communist Party in Herrin," he said. "They are all Lithuanians, besides the 19 sent down from here. The 19 sent down from here represent the Lithuanian bureau of the Communist Party. They are all members of the Lithuanian federation of the bolshevik faction of the Communist Party."

Amalgamation of the coal miners, railroad workers, marine transport workers, and farm workers into a single organization for a general strike was the program of the communists at the outset of the strike. Lenin's instructions, when he sent $1,110,000 into the country for strike-promotion purposes, called for this kind of an amalgamation. And from the outset of the coal strike the communists were as actively "boring from within" the ranks of the marine transport workers, railroad workers, and farm workers as they were among the coal miners. Communist elements in all of these unions received instructions from the central offices in Chicago and Cleveland to join in a united effort to promote and stir up a general strike in all industry. The magnet used to attract union members to this program was the "one big union" or "militant union" idea. The emissaries among farm workers preached "cooperative" effort in production and marketing, which, as taught by the communists, means eventual confiscation of the land of the man who fails or refuses to join in the communist "cooperative" scheme.

The movement for general amalgamation was specifically in charge of the Trade Union Educational League, and throughout the miners' strike Foster concentrated his efforts on its promotion and furtherance. Foster did not confine himself simply to the coal union during the strike. His function was to extend it to all unions, if possible, and bring about a general strike that would eventuate into armed uprising.

The marine transport workers were already organized as a "one big union," so that additional communist effort in this direction was not necessary. The coal miners were considered sufficiently mobilized in a "one big union" if the organization of the United Mine Workers could be captured.

But a different condition existed among the railroad workers. Four brotherhoods and 16 unions were established there. In order to control them as a unit and mobilize them into the Foster "one big union" scheme, a plan for a single "departmentalized industrial union," since known as the Minnesota plan, was evolved.

With the impetus and fresh courage given to the communist agents by the Herrin massacre, their efforts among the railroad, marine transport, and farm workers were redoubled. Some of their ablest agitators were withdrawn from among the coal miners and sent among the railroad workers. One agitator among farmers, at Washington, was sent into California to work among the agricultural interests there. Invariably the work among the railroad workers was designed to shake their faith in their officials and recognized leaders and turn them to Foster and his Trade Union Educational League. The Herrin massacre had demonstrated that the miners were capable of armed uprising. The plan was to bring about in some quarter, preferably an important railroad junction point like Chicago or Pittsburgh, a similar outbreak among railroad workers. Communist papers and publications teemed with propaganda designed to further the general idea of armed uprising. It was recognized that if an uprising came about it would not be supported by the legitimate officials of the affected unions and that thus the communist agents would have the opportunity to slip into places made vacant by ousted officials.

The idea to forcibly seize the memberships of the unions had not yet made its appearance among the communists. That came later, in November, after they had failed in all their efforts during the summer. They only proposed then to undermine the union officials by winning the rank and file of their members from them.

Later, however, they decided to throw out by any means possible the leaders of the unions and forcibly to seize records, offices, and positions, and that is the plan on which they are working to-day.

The convention of the agents of the Communist International and leaders of the Communist Party of America, at Bridgman, Mich., last August, constituted one of the greatest conspiracies in the history of the United States. The raid upon that convention by the sheriff of the county in which it was held was one of the greatest blows that the communist organization in America has ever received.

Intent upon promoting the general uprising of all coal mine, railroad, marine transport, and farm workers, and carrying their aim to a successful realization before the coal and railroad strikes could be settled, their revolutionary sittings were suddenly cut short by the appearance of the Michigan sheriff, who confined them in the local jail and compelled them to shift their activities from the promotion of industrial revolution to the raising of money for bail purposes and preparing a defense in an effort to escape imprisonment under Michigan's criminal syndicalism law.

But the matter did not end there. The coal strike was settled soon after the Bridgman raid, despite every effort on the part of the communists to prevent a settlement, and the miners returned to work.

In November, however, they were busily plotting for another strike of the coal miners on April 1, 1923, supported by a railroad strike brought about by the "one big departmentalized union" of railroad workers.

Plans for this strike were being actively laid, emissaries were hurrying to Moscow for consultation with Lenin, Zinoviev, and Losowsky. "National" conventions were being arranged for at Chicago and Cleveland. A national farmer-labor party to draw together the farm workers and the industrial workers was being promoted by Foster, funds were being sent into the country from abroad, or raised by so-called national defense committees, labor defense councils, or miners' relief committees.

Among themselves, the communists were confident that the United Mine Workers would not be successful in making a new wage agreement with the operators to go into effect on April 1. Their party press was filled with propaganda designed to close the ranks of the communists for the coming crisis on April 1.

A new contract between the United Mine Workers and the operators was effected, however, in the New York conference in January, and with it went glimmering the hope of another industrial upheaval in 1923.

Half-hearted efforts were made by Foster and his followers in the railroad unions early in November to precipitate a general strike of the railroad workers. It was decided, however, to abandon this attempt and to call a convention in Chicago on December 9 and 10 for the purpose of organizing an independent "one big union" movement among the transportation workers.

G. H. Kennedy was chosen as president of the new organization, which was brought into existence at the Chicago convention. O. H. Wangerin was selected as secretary-treasurer. Headquarters were established at St. Paul, from which place the campaign is being carried on now.

In the succeeding story the United Mine Workers of America will present the details of the efforts that have been made by the communist organization since January, and are being made at this time, to seize possession of the union and attempt again to put through the program which failed in the miners' strike last year.

ARTICLE IV

Collection of money from the American people for the promotion of the revolutionary movement in this country has become an organized industry in the last two years.

The sum which is being annually derived in this manner runs into millions of dollars, with only an approximate idea as to its aggregate. In addition, millions of dollars are being sent over from Moscow and other bolshevik centers in European capitals.

The United Mine Workers learns from an authoritative source that the money from abroad is coming in through the usual international banking channels, originating in Moscow, Berlin, or Stockholm, and that it is distributed to the accounts of various individuals in different banks after it reaches this country.

Part of the money with which the communists have attempted to get control of the United Mine Workers has been collected from the miners themselves in the belief that it was to be used in the upbuilding and strengthening of their organization, and for entirely legitimate purposes.

One such collection agency as this is known as the Miners' Relief Conference, a communist enterprise that has been operating in the Pittsburgh region since last August. The conference has been one of the most important channels through which money had filtered into the communist organization for destructive work within the miners' union.

Efforts of the communists to get control of the United Mine Workers have continued without interruption since the strike of last year came to an end with the agreement at Cleveland. In the first two months of this year these efforts centered on the proposition of bringing about an "outlaw" strike on April 1; later, to drive a wedge into the United Mine Workers through advocacy of the expedient of Government ownership of mines.

The strongest efforts of the communists to get control of the miners' union have been exerted in the last eight months. William Z. Foster, industrial organizer for the Communist International, has been at the head of the enterprise. The principal scene of action has been in southwestern Pennsylvania. The vehicle of the movement has been the Miners' Relief Conference, and the magnet for attracting the miners has been that of Government ownership of the mines.

The United Mine Workers have not approved or adopted any plan for nationalization of the mines. At the international convention two years ago a committee was appointed to make a study of the subject and submit a report, with recommendations, at the next convention, to be held next January.

Notwithstanding the fact that the miners' union is seeking to reach a conclusion on this proposition in an orderly way, the communist organization has concentrated all of its resources to the end of forcing the union to acknowledge it as the chief objective of the mine workers of this country.

The "drive" this year for the absorption of the miners by the communists was launched by Foster and his associates at Pittsburgh on February 10. A conference was held there at that time, which was attended by Foster, with Fred Merrick, communist organizer at Pittsburgh; Thomas R. Sullivan, communist organizer at St. Louis; Norman Tallentire, communist organizer at Chicago; Freeman Thompson, of Springfield, Ill., and delegates from mining fields in Ohio and Pennsylvania. The purpose of the conference was to extend the communist movement into all of the districts and locals of the union and engulf it in a wave of ultraradicalism.

Two delegates from the anthracite region were present, and they gave assurances that the hard-coal mines would be shut down on April 1 in connection with the proposed strike. But this proposed "outlaw" strike did not occur.

Three things were decided upon at this conference:

1. Establishment of headquarters for organizing activities at Pittsburgh, and the carrying on of an aggressive campaign to reorganize the miners' union in accordance with communist doctrines.

2. An effort to bring about a general strike on April 1.

3. The holding of a convention of miners' delegates of the United States and Canada in Pittsburgh during the first week in June, and launching a new international organization within the union which would gradually absorb it and eliminate its international and district officials.

Foster said at this conference that "wonderful progress" had been made among the miners in the Pittsburgh region, and that with the international convention in June he expected to arouse sufficient support in the union to enable him to control the policies of the next biennial convention in January, and establish himself as the dominant factor in the union.

Although a working agreement for the coming year had been made by the union and the operators two weeks before in a wage conference at New York City, plans for an "outlaw" strike on April 1 were frankly discussed by Foster and his associates at the conference.

"We must have no settlement of this strike until an agreement can be negotiated, under the charter of a new union having one of our own men as its leader," said Merrick.

The scheme by which it was proposed to set this strike going was to induce President Lewis to reestablish the strike of 1922 in the coke-producing region of Pennsylvania. Under the agitation of the communists it would be spread to the other coal fields by April 1. Behind this plan was a scheme of Foster's to spread the strike to other industries and bring about a general tie-up of industry during the summer.

Simultaneously with the conference at Pittsburgh the communist publications started a campaign to discredit President Lewis among the miners of the union, and to force him to reestablish the strike in the coke region as a means of protecting his influence with the miners there. J. Louis Engdahl, member of the central executive committee of the "legal" Communist Party and editor of the "legal" communist organ, the Worker, said:

Every militant trade-unionist must stand aghast at the tyrannous measures used by the high officialdom of the United Mine Workers of America in driving the Fayette County strikers back under the slave whips of the Standard Oil Co. and of the United States Steel Corporation."

Nationalization of the mines was decided upon at the conference as the principal issue of the communists in driving their wedge into the miners' union. In the official platform which was adopted there nationalization was made the chief issue. On this question the platform says:

"To meet this situation of demoralization a radical change must be made in the coal industry. There is only one solution at this moment that is possible, and that is nationalization of coal mines.

"Against this plan will be marshaled all the forces and resources of plutocratic America. The capitalist press and its journalistic hirelings, together with any army of retainers composed of the intellectual and political prostitutes of Wall Street, are flooding the country with an avalanche of lies, slander, and misrepresentation against nationalization. Corrupt and reactionary labor leaders are also opposing this plan, and every honest trades-unionist who espouses the cause is marked for persecution.

"In advocating nationalization of coal mines, the progressive coal miners mean the operation of the coal mines under the direction of competent union miners, and not under a commission composed of the usual lawyers, bankers, and politicians. A political bureaucracy sitting at Washington as directors of the coal industry would be a monstrosity worse even than the abortion known as the railroad labor board, and would never be tolerated by the rank and file of the United Mine Workers of America.

"Nationalization of coal mines, as a political program, will be a failure unless it includes genuine democratic management of the mines. Since the efficient operation of the coal mines is only possible by those who have had experience in digging coal, we demand that the program of nationalization of coal mines shall provide for the operation of the mines entirely under the direction of union miners, who alone are possessed of the technical, mechanical, and manual skill necessary for the successful operation of the mines."

Foster and Merrick started their campaign in southwestern Pennsylvania with a bang. Alexander Howat, deposed president of the Kansas miners, was brought into the region as the chief speaker and missionary. Meetings were held in Fayette, Westmoreland, and other counties in the interests of the movement. Speakers appeared before local unions, and under the pretense of reorganizing them along "militant" lines, a communist nuclei was established in many of them.

Efforts were made also to extend the movement to Ohio, West Virginia, Indiana, Illinois, central and eastern Pennsylvania, and to Nova Scotia and Alberta. Contacts were established with local union officials and State board members in Illinois; with H. E. Keas, a communist agent, in Ohio; E. R. Fay and R. P. Alcock in Alberta; and with J. B. McLachlan, Alexander McKay, and Angus McLennan in Nova Scotia.

Arrangements were made through McLachlan and McLennan for Howat to invade Nova Scotia in April and May to promote a communist organization there in conflict with the authority of the international officials of the United Mine Workers. McLachlan sent $200 to Merrick to defray Howat's traveling expenses, but Howat insisted on Thomas Myerscough, an aid of Merrick, accompanying him, and McLachlan was asked to contribute $600 more.

Howat failed in his efforts to gain entry into Canada because Canadian immigration authorities kept him out, and he returned to Pittsburgh. There he continued his campaign to overthrow the leadership of the miners and to carry out the program of the conference of February 10.

In the files in Merrick's office, which were seized at Pittsburgh, was a letter written by E. R. Fay, of Newcastle, Alberta, Canada, wrote to Myerscough, asking for a program of the insurgents, "and all necessary information to start the ball rolling to get rid of John 'Liar' Lewis and his gang of skunks." Fay said, "He acted on the recommendation of Tim Buck, the national industrial organizer of the Workers Party of Canada."

Merrick's first move for the seizure of the miners' union at Pittsburgh was to initiate a demand for a recount of the votes in the district election on December 12. He described his faction as the "progressives" and announced that "it has been decided to circulate petitions at once to recall all of the present officials of District 5 for improper conduct, especially in connection with the Fayette strike."

When the strike was settled at Cleveland last fall the communists bent their efforts to persuading the miners in southwestern Pennsylvania to refuse to return to work. The miners' relief conference was organized early in the fall on the pretext that it would provide a means of subsistence for the men and their families who refused to go back to work. J. A. Hamilton, a former school-teacher, was selected as secretary. Hamilton had direct business connections with Foster, and was known as his representative in the Pittsburgh region.

Scores of miners in southwestern Pennsylvania followed the prompting of Merrick and his aids not to return to work. Limited sums of money were supplied to them by the miners' relief conference, although an examination of such records as were kept show that in virtually every instance the relief donations were confined to miners who were either communists in principle or were agents in their neighborhoods for the communist organization.

Inspection of the records of the conference fails also to show even the simplest forms of bookkeeping in accounting for the moneys and supplies that were received. While considerable sums of money were contributed by sympathetic men and women who heeded the appeals that were broadcasted over the country, the records of the contributions are either on scraps of paper or found in the original letters of the donors.

The kindly heart of Mrs. Sarah Hyams, 252 West Seventy-sixth Street, New York City, responded to the "touching" appeal of Hamilton for money, and on October 9 she sent her check for $500, saying: "I had some money which I had made up my mind to use where it would do the most good. When your letter came I felt that this is where it should go. It does not seem possible that the condition stated by you and by so many others could exist in a country as rich as ours, or that people could be so heartless. I only hope that you will get all of the help you need, so that some of this awful poverty may be relieved."

Hamilton sent Mrs. Hyams a statement on November 3, which purported to cover the expenditure of $126 of the $500. He explained that $50 had been given to George Lutz, an idle miner at Republic, Pa. Lutz was one of the most active agents of Merrick and Hamilton in that region, and recognized as aiding them in their movement.

Miss Maude Tollefson is a teacher in a private school at Peekskill, N. Y. She was the recipient also of one of the "touching" letters of Merrick and Hamilton, and on November 7 sent in a donation. Hamilton in his reply so impressed Miss Tollefson with the worthiness of this enterprise that she appealed to her friends to join with her in making contributions. In writing to Hamilton on November 16, she said:

"By the middle of next week I will have some clothes collected from the teachers here, and possibly from friends in New York City. Will you let me know whether to send them to you, or to J. M. Geisel, whose picture you sent me with the address on the back. Also, I have sent word to my mother in South Dakota to send what she can find. I am sure she will do so."

Hamilton was the recipient also of considerable sums of money from Louis Gruss, alias "Willard," formerly of the Friends of Soviet Russia, and secretary of a so-called miners' relief committee in New York. Gruss sent to Hamilton, according to the records of the latter, a total of $1,450; but later begged Hamilton for a loan of $100 to defray the expenses and hall rent of a meeting in New York City where Howat would speak.

Appeals were sent by these communists to local unions of the United Mine Workers in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and West Virginia, asking that arbitrary assessments for "relief" purposes in the coke region be laid on the memberships, and the money remitted to Merrick and Hamilton. Some of the local unions were induced to do this, with usually an assesment of 25 cents a member. Local unions in Franklin and Williamson Counties, in Illinois, and in the vicinity of Bellaire, Ohio, sent sums of as much as $300 each.

The relationship between Merrick and Hamilton and the communist organization is shown in their connection with the labor defense council at Chicago. A few days after the raid upon the communist convention at Bridgman, Mich., last August, the national defense committee, a communist agency, was reorganized into the labor defense council.

The council launched on the task of raising $200,000 for bail purposes at Bridgman, and to employ lawyers and provide funds for the trials of the individuals who had been caught in the sheriff's dragnet. Explicit instructions were sent to every communist agency in the country to "get busy" at the task of raising money for this purpose. Organizers and district officials were told by the communist central organization to give unqualified support to the demands of the labor defense council. As far as possible donations were to be sought from the labor unions on the claim that the raid on the revolutionary gathering at Bridgman imperiled the cause of organized labor in this country.

Moritz J. Loeb, secretary of the labor defense council, wrote to Merrick and Hamilton, on December 6, as follows:

"Comrade Ruthenburg has assured us that the Workers Party organizers will be held responsible for activity toward the organization of labor defense councils in their districts. We have seen a copy of the letter at the national office of the workers' party sent out in this respect. It is our understanding that you are the district organizer of the Pittsburgh district and we would very much like to have you take responsibility toward organizing the labor defense council in your district, seriously."

A week later Loeb wired to Merrick, as follows:

"Five men remaining in Berrien jail can all be released for $15,000. Exert every effort. Raise everything possible, cash or Liberty bonds. Send us what you have immediately. We must get men out by Christmas. Put on small drive. Do your part and we succeed."

Early in January the labor defense council sent Tom Tippett, business manager of the Federated Press, into the Pittsburgh district as its special agent to assist in the money raising. Merrick and Hamilton were told to give their support to making the Tippett meetings a success. On this point Loeb said:

"Please do not be too economical in your advertising of the Tom Tippett meeting. We are particularly anxious that you should get out a good crowd, even though the financial returns on the investment are not of the best."

Advertising matter was sent to Merrick by Loeb which stated that—"the reporter for the labor press on the Herrin trial will come to Pittsburgh to tell of the nation-wide attack on labor, the open-shop drive of which Herrin, West Virginia, and the Bridgman raids are only the outstanding examples. No better representative of the working class can tell this story, as Tippet has been an actual observer of the major campaigns which have been calculated to destroy the labor movement."

The extent to which money was diverted from the miners' relief conference at Pittsburgh into the coffers of the labor defense council for use at the Bridgman trials or into other communist channels can not be definitely ascertained from the records in the office of Merrick and Hamilton. However, Hamilton, in a letter of January 7, said:

"This relief work has succeeded much beyond expectations, as we have sent into Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, Fayette, and Greene Counties nearly $9,000 worth of various kinds of relief. Besides we have thrown some hot shot into the contemptible official circles, and in this way helped considerable in getting the union to give what scanty support it is giving to the Fayette County men.

"This sort of activity is what makes me satisfied with my affiliation with the Workers Party as I have never been either a member of the Socialist Party or as unaffiliated. The W. P. is endeavoring to day by day take part in the struggles of the working class in such a manner as to assist most in the final overthrow of capitalism."

The data at hand show that Merrick's and Hamilton's work for the miners' relief conference was so intimately associated with their work for the labor defense council that it is difficult at times to distinguish between them. Hamilton gave as much time and effort, according to his own reports, to the promotion of the labor defense council, purely a communist enterprise, as he did to the miners' relief conference.

The correspondence shows that while Merrick and Hamilton were appealing to the people of the country for money for the relief of "starving miners" they were also holding mass meetings in the same region to collect money from these "starving miners" to remit to the labor defense council at Chicago.

When Merrick declined to approve the suggestion that another agent of the labor defense council be sent into the Pittsburgh region he gave as his reason that they were then collecting all the money from these "starving miners" which he believed it was possible to do.

Merrick in carrying on his work maintained close contact with Ruthenburg, William W. Weinstone, James P. Cannon, J. Louis Engdahl, William Z. Foster, and William F. Kruse, of the communist organizations, and with Roger Baldwin, of the American Civil Liberties Union. Merrick was in frequent correspondence with Ruthenburg during last winter and spring concerning the details of the communist campaign in the miners' union. Ruthenburg was irritated at the resistance offered by the United Mine Workers to the distribution of radical literature by Merrick, and on February 10 he wrote to Merrick as follows:

"Certainly we can not agree with your viewpoint in regard to the defense nor with the action of the district executive committee in ordering the discontinuance of the distribution of the program in the Pittsburgh district. There has been distributed by the communist movement in the United States literature that was considered even more radical than the program could be, and ways and means have been found in which to make the distribution. Certainly we should not, because of attacks of the authorities and the arrest of three of our members, permit that to interfere with the continuation of our work. That is not the communist attitude. The communist viewpoint is to continue the work of the movement irrespective of what the authorities say or do in persecuting our party. This does not mean that you need to make the distribution in such a manner as to expose the members to arrest, but certainly you should not allow such a little thing comparatively as has happened in your district to interfere with the continuance of the work."

The American Civil Liberties Union was called upon by Merrick to give assistance in freeing the radical agents and emissaries who were arrested in the Pittsburgh region. A small loan was made to Merrick in one of these cases from the Garland Foundation fund. In writing to Baldwin for a renewal of the note covering this loan on January 13, Merrick said:

"Due to the terrific fight that developed in the election campaign in district 5 of the U. M. W. of A., we are compelled to go to the miners for every cent we can get to carry on the fight of the progressive miners. As a result of it, have won the election. While the machine, one of the most corrupt in the U. M. W. of A., claims victory by a small margin, we have proof that they were defeated and will carry it to the international executive board."

Baldwin replied that the board had agreed "with pleasure to extend your note for 60 days."

In writing to C. E. Ruthenburg on August 10 Merrick said, with reference to Roger Baldwin, managing director of the American Civil Liberties Union and the Garland Foundation:

"In answer to my letter to Baldwin concerning the $2,000 to the Garland fund I got the information that the money has already been voted to be used exclusively in district No. 2 in central Pennsylvania. I can not blame Baldwin, for Brophy, the president of the organization, is a fine fellow and has cooperated with the Civil Liberties Union all along, while the district officials here have refused to help at all."

Baldwin was also called upon by Merrick for a loan to finance the election contest in the Pittsburgh district against the officials of the United Mine Workers. The board of the Garland Foundation fund refused to make this loan, however, and Baldwin advised Merrick to this effect.

Merrick's relations with James P. Cannon, known as "the paymaster" of the communists, during the eight months' "drive" have been equally intimate and businesslike. Cannon was the individual directly responsible for sending William F. Dunne into the Pittsburgh region at the start of the miners' strike in 1922. In writing to Merrick at that time concerning Dunne's prospective visit, Cannon said:

"We fully appreciate the importance of the Pittsburgh district in the present coal situation and want to help you in every way possible to make the most of the possibilities offered."

In the next article dealing with the communist revolutionary movement in this country the United Mine Workers will present the facts concerning the "boring from within" campaign as it relates to all trade-unions and labor organizations in the United States and the interlocking directorates and the mechanism by which these organizations are found together and conduct their work virtually as one departmentalized unit.

ARTICLE V

The Communist Party of America was created for the purpose of taking possession of the United Mine Workers of America, the American Federation of Labor, and the labor unions of the country, and, through them, overthrowing the Government of the United States.

This has been its continuing purpose since the days in May, 1921, when it was brought into existence on the top of Overlook Mountain, in the Catskills, near Woodstock, N. Y.

The decision of the Communist International to organize a secret or "underground" party in America was due to the fact that its manifestoes and communications to this country, as well as the program of action of its political units and groups, advocated the overthrow of the Government by force, violence, and armed insurrection, and made its members subject to prosecution in many of the States or to deportation at the hands of the Federal Government.

The courts of the country had judicially held that the purpose of the Communist International, on its own declarations, was to overthrow the Government, which made membership of an alien in the Communist Party grounds per se for deportation.

The United Mine Workers of America is in possession of original and authenticated copies of the manifestoes and communications that were sent to America by the Communist International at the time the Communist Party in America was brought into existence. These documents establish clearly what the purpose of the party was. And the manifestoes and communications that have been received from Moscow since that time show that its intent and purpose has continued to be the same that it was when it was organized.

Seventy communist leaders, representing the two factions of the Communist Party, and the United Communist Party, gathered in the ancient hotel on the top of Overlook Mountain on the morning of May 15, 1921, to compose their differences and unite in a single group, to be known as the Communist Party of America. This assembly was not only at the command of Lenin and Zinoviev, of the Communist International, but it was accompanied with the threat that if the factional differences were not put aside and a united front presented for invading the labor unions of the United States, no more money would be forthcoming from Moscow for financing the revolutionary movement in this country. Up to that time Moscow had contributed money to both of these factions, but had decided that their hostility to each other was neutralizing the results of their work.

Charles E. Scott, member of the Pan-American Bureau, or supreme communist agency in the Western Hemisphere at that time, appeared at the convention as the personal emissary of Lenin and Zinoviev. Scott possessed the power to break deadlocks and force an amalgamation of the two factions.

Scott was essentially a fighter. He was a practical man, and a man of few words. There was nothing of the theory propounding radical about him. He wanted action in America rather than words, and his mission at Overlook Mountain was to see to it that the two communist factions established themselves on a basis for aggressive action.

Scott had been a resident of the United States and Canada for more than two years. He was then making his home in Boston. The other members of his bureau were Sen Katayama, alias "Yavki," an elderly Japanese then living in Mexico City, and Louis C. Fraina, who was spending his time in Berlin as an agent for the American communists.

Scott's real name was Jakor Davidovitch Janson. He had formerly been a representative of the communist commissariat for foreign affairs at Irkutsk. He saw military service on the Polish front in 1919 and fought with the Bolshevik forces in the Caucasus early in the same year. From August, 1920, to the beginning of 1921 he was chief of the eastern department of the Soviet régime in Russia, and was sent to China early in 1921.

Silent and taciturn in his bearing, Scott met the 70 delegates in the vicinity of Kingston. They were conveyed to the foot of Overlook Mountain in automobiles. Guards saluted them as they passed along the road. For more than two weeks these guards has been stationed in the vicinity of Fort Montgomery, Tannersville, Saugerties, and Kingston. Trains arriving at these towns were observed by sentinels. A guard remained behind the delegates to watch the village marshal in Woodstock. Other guards were scattered around the country as farm hands. There were guards also in the Grand Central Station in New York. Scott broke his silence to say that the prospective convention could only be raided by a squadron of cavalry, and that, with his guards on the alert, its presence would be known when 30 miles away.

Alighting from their automobiles, the delegates climbed in single file up the mountain. Other guards were encountered along the trail.

When they reached the Overlook Mountain Inn, on the top of the mountain, they were assigned two in a room. Two of the delegates were women. A steering committee forbade anyone to go beyond 200 feet from the hotel unless they were going to the meeting place of a committee or of the convention in the woods. The delegates were all searched, and every scrap of paper or other evidence that would be incriminating if the place was raided was taken from them. They were forbidden to write letters or to make notes unless they were in the committee or convention room, and then only for the purpose of speaking on the question under discussion. These scraps of paper were to be given to the committee as soon as the delegate had finished his remarks. Twice each day the persons of the delegates were searched, as were their rooms.

As night approached guards could be seen signaling each other with flashlights from the mountain tops that all was well.

Sixty of these men were representatives of the Communist Party and of the United Communist Party. The remainder were communist leaders in the United States and associated with Scott. There were delegates from all of the communist districts, including Minneapolis and Duluth. The Pacific coast was represented by L. E. Katterfield, a young communist who was born in Kansas and graduated from a Wichita college. James P. Cannon, chief fiscal agent of the Communist International, was present, but left the convention several days before it adjourned to go to Kansas City to attend his trial on a charge of sedition. Robert Minor, said to be the son of a circuit judge in San Antonio, and a former newspaper cartoonist at St. Louis, was present as the representative of the Communist International in propaganda matters.

For three days the factions caucused separately, and then at a spot in the woods, with the delegates seated in a natural amphitheater, the convention was called to order by Dr. Jacob Hartmann, alias "Swift," connected with the Russian famine and medical relief at New York. Hartmann used a bowlder for a platform desk.

Here the Communist Party of America was brought into existence. the important decisions were that it should be an "underground" or secret organization, with its existence manifest only through related and subsidiary organizations; that the central executive committee should exercise supreme discipline and control over all communist groups in the United States, including the language federations; and that it should determine and voice the policies of the communist movement in this country—in accordance with the mandates and instructions of the Communist International.

On the point of control of the language federations the Russian delegates made bitter objection, but a radiogram came from Moscow saying that the delegates of neither party would be received at the World Congress of the Communist International in July unless both parties were fully united.

The central executive committee of the United Communist Party announced that the communist leaders at Moscow had sent a special contribution of $135,000 to this country to finance the unity project, but that to date only $50,000 had been actually received on this side, which had been equally divided between the Communist Party and the United Communist Party. It was decided to tax the party membership 50 cents each to defray the expenses of the convention there.

When the convention came to a close on May 29 Minor and one other individual were chosen as delegates to go to Moscow and inform Lenin that communist unity in America had been achieved. Two days later Minor was on the high seas.

An indication of just what party unity meant was shown a few days later when a Russian branch of the old Communits Party at Akron, Ohio, was found to have $1,000 in its treasury. There was a grand and glorious feeling in the district headquarters of the new party in Cleveland when this discovery was made, and the money was promptly confiscated under a decision of the Overlook convention that no group or local unit could have more than $15 on hand for its personal use.

The central executive committee of the new party was chosen from among members and leaders of various organizations of the country. These included the Friends of Soviet Russia, the Russian Medical Relief Society, the Industrial Soviet League, the People's Reconstruction League, the Farmer-Labor Party as it then existed, the Industrial Workers of the World, the World War Veterans, and later the Workers Party of America and the Trade Union Educational League.

A few months after this convention was held the Workers Party was organized under the specific instructions of Lenin at a communist convention in Brooklyn as the "legal" branch of the Communist Party of America.

The program of action adopted by the Overlook Mountain convention was in its essential aspects the same as had already been proclaimed by the United Communist Party. It called for mass action by the workers, seizure of labor unions, and converting them into "militant" enterprises, "boring from within" the American Federation of Labor, and, in particular, the seizure of the United Mine Workers of America.

The chief aim of the Communist Party of America, as developed in the Overlook Mountain convention, was to put the control of the revolutionary movement in America in the hands of a definite group of leaders, functioning as one committee, and exercising authority over all communist activity in this country through a specific grant of authority from Lenin and the Communist International. It is interesting, therefore, to find that when the Workers Party was organized nine of the members of the central executive committee of the Communist Party were named as members of its central executive committee also.

These nine were Jay Lovestone, alias "Wheat," executive secretary of the Communist Party; Earl Browder, alias "Ward" and "Dixon," editor of the organ of the Trade Union Educational League; James P. Cannon, alias "Cook," chairman of the Workers Party; Ludwig Lore, alias "Young," editor of a communist organ in New York City; Robert Minor, alias "Ballister," representative of the Communist International in America; A. Bittelman, alias "Raphael," communist organizer in New York; Alexander Trachtenberg, communist writer and author in New York; William W. Weinstone, alias "Lewis," national official of the Workers Party; and C. E. Ruthenburg, alias "Damon," executive secretary of the Workers Party.

When Delegate Tyrosowsky, alias "Stepan," alias "Wallace," returned from the Congress of the Communist International early in 1922, he appeared before the central executive committee of the Communist Party and made a report concerning the Workers Party and the work in America, which was quoted to the communist leaders by the committee in the following language:

"During the Congress the greatest leader of the Comintern (Communist International) held an interview with the whole American delegation. In his opinion the American comrades do not utilize all of the opportunities of the struggle. Among other means of utilization of opportunities for legal communist work Comrade L. (Lenin) advised us to take the necessary steps to establish a legal communist organization. The legal organization should be the camp in which the revolutionary workers who can not very well be admitted to the underground will be mobilized."

There are 200 organizations in the United States actively engaged in or sympathetic with the communist revolutionary movement as directed and conducted by the Communist Party of America. Some of them are local in their scope and work, others are nation-wide. Forty-five of these organizations of either "pink" or radical structure are engaged in the communist effort to seize control of the labor unions in this country and convert them to the revolutionary movement. In virtually every instance these organizations have direct contact through the mechanism of interlocking directorates with the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America or with its "legal" branch, the Workers Party of America.

Fifty-two persons hold 325 directorates in these 45 organizations. A study of the interlocking arrangement shows that all of these organizations are fused into a single whole. The extreme radicals are promoting the revolutionary movement, and a dozen intermediate degrees of "liberal" radicals and "parlor pinks" are cooperating with them intimately and closely, so that the contact is complete from end to end of the scale. There is no gap or breaking point. Ten of the directors appear in radical as well as "liberal" groups, and at the same time among the "civil liberties" or "intellectual pink" groups.

Illustrative of this arrangement is the executive committee and the national committee of the American Civil Liberties Union, at New York, posing as the champion of free speech and civil liberty, but serving as a forerunner and trail blazer for the active and insidious activities of the communists among labor organizations. Harry F. Ward, born in London in 1873, and chancellor of the Union Theological Seminary, is chairman of this organization. The managing director is Roger Baldwin, who served a term as a draft evader in the Essex County jail, in New Jersey, in 1918 and 1919.

Other members on the national committee include Norman M. Thomas, who is connected with six other organizations and who is a clergyman, combining intellectual radicalism with religion; Peter Poscal Cosgrove, of Boston, a Nova Scotian, who has recently been a recruiting agent for William D. Haywood's industrial unit, the Kuzbas, in Russia; Felix Frankfurter, member of the law faculty at Harvard University; Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, a solicitor of funds for the I. W. W.; William Z. Foster, born in Massachusetts in the eighties, and heading the Trade Union Educational League; John Haynes Holmes, member of the League for Amnesty of Political Prisoners—an enterprise to obtain the release of the potential communist leadership from the Federal and State prisons; Norman Hapgood, a newspaper writer; Arthur Garfield Hayes, a New York attorney; Robert Morss Lovett, former professor at the University of Chicago, and first president of the Federated Press; Judah L. Magnes, head of the Jewish Kehillah in New York City; and Oswald Garrison Villard, a New York publisher.

The major propaganda distributing agency of the communists is the Federated Press. This is an alleged newspaper service with headquarters at Chicago. It has been financed and promoted through the central communist organization, under instructions of the Communist International at Moscow. It serves approximately 200 newspapers, publications, and agencies in America and about 120 newspapers in Europe. It also supplies an "economic service," described by William Z. Foster as "consisting of statistics upon the actual condition of our industrial system," to local labor unions that can be induced to subscribe for it.

When organized in January, 1920, it had eight members. This number increased to 125 before the end of 1921. Practically every revolutionary group in America, including the Industrial Workers of the World, has cooperated with this enterprise. It has established branches in 30 cities, including the National Capital. This agency is the medium through which the great mass of propaganda favorable to the red flag of general destruction in Russia is being circulated in this country.

Robert Morss Lovett, of New York, as president of the Federated Press, sent Bruce Rogers, an organizer of the Communist Party, to the Pacific coast last year to solicit funds for the Federated Press. In a letter to Rogers on April 29, 1922, he instructed him to approach the wealthy "intellectuals" of Los Angeles and certain well-known motion-picture magnates and stars at Hollywood with requests for donations, saying:

"These men are with us. They helped us before and they will do it again. Present the situation strong, and don't let them off easy, for we need the money, and need it badly."

Rogers sought life-membership subscription in the Federated Press "pink" circles of Los Angeles, where he confided that:

1. The Federated Press does not represent the viewpoint of the great mass of organized labor because it is "too far advanced," and "too revolutionary" for the conservative American workingman.

2. No enterprise was ever financed by passing the hat, and the small contributions being received from organized labor are not sufficient to keep the Federated Press going.

Robers sought life-membership subscriptions in the Federated Press at $1,000 each. He raised more than $20,000 in Los Angeles alone.

Francis Drake, editor of the Citizen, a labor publication in Los Angeles, challenged the statements of Rogers as to the purpose of the Federated Press and informed him that the Citizen would not print the "news" distributed by it because "it is communist propaganda, and colored in the interests of disruptionists like William Z. Foster, Alexander Howat, and Curley Grow."

National committees are a favorite mechanism with the communists in their organizations. These committees are nothing more than an interlocking arrangement, ranging from communist parties to apparently harmless welfare enterprises, through which the communist central group are attempting to take possession of the labor unions, with the American Federation of Labor, in this order: First, the United Mine Workers of America; second, the four railroad brotherhoods and 16 railroad unions; third, the textile workers, including knit-goods workers, loom fixers, silk weavers, hosiery workers, and wool sorters; fourth, the steel and packing-house workers; and fifth, the farm workers.

The purpose of the Communist Party of America as the central contact of all communist enterprises is found in the official organ, the Communist, for July, 1922:

"The purpose of the underground organization of the Communist Party of America is to function adroitly within a solid body of cells for secret and illegal activities, and as a caucus for the purpose of controlling the open movement and keeping it along correct lines. * * *

"We must correlate the struggles of our workers with the struggle of the Russian workers by so coordinating our fight for such immediate needs as unemployment relief, with the demand for recognition of and unrestricted trade relations with Soviet Russia.

"We must wage the fight directly through the activities aimed at strengthening the Communist International and the Red Trade Union International.

"Without a proletarian army the Communist Party of America will accomplish nothing. The proletarian army that the Communist Party of America must guide and lead is the organized labor movement of the country. The organized labor movement contains the great masses of the workers who have fought against capitalism for their immediate interests, and are prepared to do so over and over again. The bulk of the organized workers in America are in the American Federation of Labor.

"The historic rôle of the Communist Party is through its leadership to marshal the working classes against the capitalist class, conquer and destroy the State power, and establish the dictatorship of the proletariat."

The assault to seize the American Federation of Labor started five years ago with the organization of the United Communist Party and has continued with unchanging persistence ever since. The platform of the United Communist Party contained the first unqualified attack upon the Federation and the labor unions affiliated with it. This document said:

"The United Communist Party must systematically and persistently familiarize the working class with the fact of the inevitability of armed conflict in the proletarian revolution. The United Communist Party must prepare the working class for armed insurrection as the final form of mass action, by which the workers shall conquer the State.

"The conquest of the State and the annihilation of its governmental machinery becomes the immediate object of the struggle. Consciously to direct this inevitable development and to lead the working class in the final conflict is the historic mission of the United Communist Party.

"The class struggle, which so long appeared in forms unrecognizable to the millions of workers directly engaged in it, develops into an open combat, civil war.

"The United Communist Party confirms the present necessity of militant workers remaining with the large mass of organized workers, regardless of the declared reactionary aims of these unions, and, by determined and coordinated strength, turning these unions to a revolutionary course. The United Communist Party, section of the Communist International, is the instrument of that coordination of revolutionary work within the labor unions.

"Members of the United Communist Party will form the revolutionary group in each union, regardless of what kind of union it may be. The United Communist Party caucuses with the union shall have the power to discipline, to compel communists regularly to attend union meetings. They shall by discipline regulate the activities of the communists on the floor and in voting in the union assembly. Upon every important question affecting the welfare of the union and labor in general, the caucus shall formulate a policy and all members shall strictly adhere to the decision.

"The workers' revolution can not succeed without the support of the great bulk of whatever labor organizations may exist at the time. For these reasons the United Communist Party can not be satisfied with the formation of a few new unions of declared revolutionary purpose, but of small membership and slight relation to key industries."

The efforts of the communists are not confined to taking possession of trade-unions. They have a systematic program also for entering legislatures and municipal assemblies, and with the declaration that their members in those positions are amenable to the same discipline as in the trade-unions. They aim also to enter the Army and the Navy. Bukharin and Berzin, of the executive committee of the Communist International, in a manifesto to the communists of America two years ago, said:

"We consider one of the most important tasks before you is the organization of communist groups in the Army and Navy, which should carry on energetic propaganda in favor of soldiers' and sailors' soviets, and denunciatory agitation against officers and generals.

"Act centrally. Do not fall asunder. Organize conspirative revolutionary headquarters."

Local chapters of the Trade Union Educational League have been established in every industrial city in the country for the purpose of carrying on the campaign against the trade-unions. Foster's greatest success at the outset in promoting this enterprise was on the Pacific coast, especially around Los Angeles and in central California. A larger volume of pernicious ultraradical activity is centered around Los Angeles than any other city in the United States with the single exception of the metropolitan district of New York. Revolutionary radicalism is profitable around Los Angeles because it is made so by the wealthy "intellectuals" there who are dabbling in it.

Funds which Foster and his group are spending in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and other places to seize control of the United Mine Workers are to an unusual extent being derived from wealthy residents of Los Angeles, Pasadena, Altadena, Long Beach, and other places around Los Angeles. Revolutionary agents coming direct from Moscow are received in homes there and tendered dinners by so-called "intellectual clubs."

Pernicious and revolutionary propaganda distributed among the coal miners in the strike of 1922, and intended to arouse them to violence and "mass action," was, in a number of instances, turned out by so-called popular authors and novelists in Los Angeles who are receiving from $600 to $800 a month from the "intellectual pinks" of that vicinity for doing that sort of thing. Foster's first and chief foothold for the Trade Union Educational League in the first 12 months that he promoted it was in and around Los Angeles. Even the Communist International has learned that the most appropriate spot for launching new revolutionary movements and organizations is Los Angeles.

When A. Plotkin, a representative of the Communist International, started his work in this country in September, 1922, to seize the railroad unions as the communists were attempting to seize the United Mine Workers, he went straight to Los Angeles as the initial point. Later he carried on his work in other parts of the country with money donated to him at Los Angeles.

New efforts and activities of the communists in the coming months, indicating the nature of their program for the future, will be outlined in the next article of this series.

ARTICLE VI

The bolshevik movement in the United States would have sapped its own energies and disintegrated, or have degenerated into pure anarchy, if it had not been for the support and assistance that it has constantly received from the so-called "parlor bolsheviks" and "pink revolutionists" in America. They have served the function of keeping it alive and on an active footing, when otherwise the efforts of Lenin and the Communist International would have failed.

Investigation by the United Mine Workers of America into all phases of the communist efforts has clearly disclosed the fact that the funds of wealthy men and women, flattered by the glamor of pseudo "intellectuality," has instilled new energy and given new leases of life to the communist movement, and enabled its agents and organizers to multiply to proportions which, at this time, gives them and their activities an aspect that challenges the attention not only of the labor unions but of the whole country.

The dangers that lie in the future are in the seemingly harmless and innocuous expedients with which the communists have learned to cloak and conceal their true aims and purposes. One of these is the plot to compel recognition of Soviet Russia by the Government of the United States, with the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

No greater victory short of the overthrow of the Federal Government itself could be won by the communist organization in this country than to bring about recognition of the soviet régime in Russia by this Government. Experience has demonstrated that wherever the Soviet Government goes, it goes for propaganda. If diplomatic relations were established with this country, the soviet régime would be the sole beneficiary.

A recognized government is entitled to a consulate in every city, and a consular staff may be as large as desired and may do about what it wants to do. In the light of their past activities, the first thing that the soviets might be expected to do in the United States, if accorded recognition, would be to establish "consulates," with large propaganda staffs, in all of the leading cities. The present "underground" revolutionary organization centered around the Communist Party of America would then be able to come to the surface and start its work with renewed impetus in the open.

With the diplomatic doors opened to them the soviets could bring in men and money in such numbers and sums as they desired. While the possibility of their overthrowing the American Government is not to be conceded, one of the major lines of defense against them and their revolutionary designs and purposes would be removed; they would be afforded unlimited opportunities for their revolutionary work, and energies that are sorely needed for constructive effort in America would be diverted and dissipated in fighting the serpent in the house.

Establishment of diplomatic relations with the communists, with consulates in whatever cities they wished to put them, would give them unlimited opportunities for attacking the labor unions and trade organizations, and create an active recognized revolutionary machinery in this country against which the unions and the Government would have little or no protection.

Every effort has been exerted by the communists in the last five years to get control of the labor unions. With Soviet Russia given diplomatic recognition the unions that have so far successfully combated their inroads would be placed virtually at their mercy, and made doubly vulnerable to the assaults and attacks of the red hosts at Moscow.

Deportations of alien communists would be halted, and the red agents of Moscow when arrested in this country would demand the "protection" of the consulates and diplomatic emissaries of the Communist International.

The communists have a strong organization in the vicinity of Bellaire, Ohio, from which much of their revolutionary activity is being carried on. A soviet consulate could be established there. They have boasted that they instigated and carried out what took place at Herrin, Ill. They could establish a consulate at Herrin. They have used dynamite and shotguns in southwestern Pennsylvania. They might have consulates at Pittsburgh, Uniontown, Connellsville, and Johnstown. They might establish a "consulate" in every industrial center in this country.

Another phase of the communist movement in America at this time that commands attention is the demand for the release of "political" prisoners who are confined in the Federal and State prisons. This is a phase of the revolutionary movement that goes hand in hand with the demand for recognition of Soviet Russia. The center of the communist movement is an outgrowth of, and to a certain extent, a continuation of the German espionage system here during the war. Some of its methods and practices, such as its system of "underground" activity, with camouflaged organizations on the surface, are essentially the same as were employed by the German espionage and propaganda agents during the war.

Germany had an excellent organization in the United States, conducted and managed by astute and skilled leaders. The higher agents were sent into the country from abroad, but they were told that the rank and file of their units and groups must be recruited from among the malcontents and disloyalists in the United States. As a result of this program, large numbers of anarchists, syndicalists, agitators, would-be revolutionists, enemies of the Government, and individuals who had been convicted of crime were enlisted in the German service. In no other strata could recruits be found in such numbers as were needed. An "underground" organization, as well as a "surface" one, was established by the Germans.

After the armistice the various units that the Germans had created continued to exist for mutual benefit. None of these units had any particular love or respect for the other, but they were all working in some measure together. They had been brought into direct contact with each other for the first time, had formed acquaintances, been under discipline, and had learned to cooperate without fomenting factionalism among themselves.

When the flow of German money into the country stopped, these agents and units turned to the bolsheviks, who had seized Russia, and through the plunder of banks and estates were in a position to finance a revolutionary movement in America. The bolsheviks had the money to spend for propaganda, and they had come to a realization that if their dictatorship in Russia was to survive they must engage in an extensive campaign of world propaganda and revolutionary activity.

The American units were successful in their overtures to the Lenin régime. Indeed, Trotsky was in some measure their emissary. They held out the prospect to the bolsheviks that with proper cultivation and intensive effort the revolutionary units already existing in the United States could quickly mobilize the labor unions and trade unionists for an armed uprising, with seizure and overthrow of the Government, and the establishment of a soviet dictatorship responsible to and maintaining allegiance to the Communist International.

It will thus be seen that from the very outset the trade unions of America have been the first and chief objective of the communists and the instrumentality through which they have expected to accomplish their ends.

To-day the bolshevik organization in America is better systematized, more coordinated, and has a larger range of activities than it ever had before. These activities are expanding and spreading in scope. The communist organization is not as elastic as it was in the hands of the Germans, and it is not as well financed. It is, nevertheless, very real and very effective, and from a skeleton organization created by the Germans has multiplied many times in strength and scope of action, and to-day has ramifications that reach into virtually every labor union, every industry, every community, and most of the phases of American life.

The movement for the release of "political" prisoners goes back to the days when the Germans were in control of the organization. Many of the German agents were convicted of violation of the war-time laws and confined in Federal penitentiaries. To effect their release and give the Moscow communists the benefit of their entire potential leadership in this country the campaign has been carried on for the release of political prisoners. The claim has been made that it has been intended to secure the release of conscientious objectors. The communications of the Moscow leaders to the red leaders in this country show that the real purpose has been to quietly obtain the release of the imprisoned communists under a hue and cry for the release of conscientious objectors.

The communist movement is feeding in a large degree on the demand for a resumption of trade with Russia. There are no obstacles to export and import trade with Russia except those handicaps which they have imposed upon themselves through the dissipation and exhaustion of their own economic resources, and their interference with the productivity of the Russian people.

The chief obstacle to the resumption of normal trade relations with Russia has been in the fact that foreign trade has remained in the hands of soviet agents, so that American exporters had to deal solely with them, and were not granted an opportunity to ship their goods into Russia for sale to Russian individuals. A second obstacle has been in the fact that the monetary reserves have been exhausted. With production reduced, the soviets have had nothing to resume trade with.

Even if Russia were given diplomatic recognition, and the soviets removed the restrictions they have imposed upon foreign trading, there could not be a normal exchange of goods until the soviets provided guaranties for the security of the goods sent into the country. The handicap of the soviets having little or nothing to exchange would still remain. In all probability such recognition would furnish an excuse for the bolshevik propagandists launching an agitation in the United States for a foreign loan to the soviets to resuscitate the wrecked and ruined industries of their country, and incidentally to finance their own activity in this country.

During the next 12 months the communists will bend greater efforts than at any time in the past to effect the seizure and control of the American Federation of Labor and the United Mine Workers of America. Their recent correspondence contains renewed demands that the "boring from within" campaign shall be carried on more energetically, and that there shall be larger results than in the past. They adhere to the belief, as set forth in their communications, that if they can seize control of these two organizations, and gradually absorb the remaining large labor unions, they can do what they like with the Government and the rest of society, as they have done in Russia where there are no bona fide labor unions.

They are systematically working to exploit every unusual situation or disturbance in furtherance of their revolutionary aims. They are in readiness to seize upon every opportunity offered by national industrial or political conditions to further their program. They are hopeful of controlling the next annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, in October, and are carefully working now to control a majority of the delegates that attend it. They are hopeful that a nation-wide strike of the coal miners will take place next April, which will afford them an opportunity again to attempt the seizure of the union through revolutionary methods, as they attempted in the strike of 1922.

Revolutionary agents are working among the miners in a half-dozen States—Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, West Virginia, and the Southwest—and in Nova Scotia and Alberta to force a strike in April. They believe that the coal operators will refuse to make a new agreement with the miners' union, as they refused in 1922, and that the miners will have no other option than to cease work.

They are working also among the State federations of labor. William Z. Foster, head of the Trade Union Educational League, speaking at the communist gathering of miners in Pittsburgh, on June 2, declared that the "one big union" idea has already been adopted by 13 State federations of labor, and that the federations in other States give promise of immediately following in their wake.

Foster has organized a group in the Pittsburgh district known as the "Progressive Miners International Committee of the United Mine Workers of America" to conduct the preliminary work in anticipation of a general miners' strike next April. He has carefully explained that this committee is not a dual union movement, but that it seeks to "reform" the United Mine Workers. He says that it proposes to establish a "radical bloc" in the United Mine Workers. Similar "blocs," he declares, exist in the needle, marine, transport, metal, and building trades, and among the railroad workers.

"The purpose of these blocs," it is explained, "is to educate the rank and file of workers to seize control of their respective unions and then when that is accomplished amalgamate under the one big union idea."

Foster drew up the resolutions that were adopted when the "Progressive Miners International Committee" was organized, and they were put through the convention with the assistance of his son-in-law, Joe Manley. At the same time plans were devised for holding the next meeting of the committee three days before the international convention of the United Mine Workers of America, at Indianapolis, Ind., next January, when plans would be devised for attempting to seize control of the convention, the organization, and official positions of the miners' union.

Loyal union members have known little or nothing of the designs of the communists on the labor organizations. In each instance the communist agent has posed as a "friend" of labor. In many instances these agents have been foreigners, attached to one of the foreign language federations of the Communist Party of America. The propaganda and revolutionary doctrines have been spread through different languages, and through newspapers and publications established in this country for that purpose. One of these newspapers last year cleared a profit of $20,000 for the communists, in addition to furnishing them with their circulars and leaflets free of charge.

Whether the major communist organizations go forward or slip backward, the leaders of the movement in the country are prepared to stand behind the chief idea and push it through the labor unions. With a foothold in the unions they are prepared, if necessary, to abandon the major organizations they have established in this country.

Names of these organizations are changed frequently. This is in accordance with the suggestion of Lenin, himself, who believes that when the stigma of communism is definitely attached to a "surface" organization, it should be merged into a new group. In this manner the members of the old organization are retained and new members more easily obtained.

Money in great sums is coming into the country to finance these efforts. It is not merely to pay the expenses of propaganda and revolutionary effort among the trade-unions, but is intended to enable the communists also to keep in close touch with the affairs of the National Government at Washington. A half dozen agents are on the job in Washington all the time, whose duty it is to watch each movement and gauge the political effect of each action taken by the Government.

More than a million dollars for the communist movement was raised in this country under the guise of Russian famine relief. This money was deposited in banks in New York and Chicago in the name of relief committees, and eventually found its way, after passing through various other bank accounts, into the hands of the real communist emissaries in the United States, the most prominent of whom at that time was Dr. Jacob Dubrowsky, of New York, successor of Ludwig C. A. K. Martens, self-styled soviet "ambassador" to this country.

Heavy sums of money were sent into the country at the time of the disarmament conference at Washington. In December, 1921, the communists sent Doctor Dubrowsky the sum of 100,000 crowns, with which he was to go to Washington and follow the proceedings of the conference. Another sum of 50,000 crowns was sent to agents of the Young Communist League, at Philadelphia, to carry on propaganda efforts while the conference was in session.

The objective of the communist in this country is to be gathered from the "constitution" of the new Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, at Moscow, which was adopted July 6, 1923. This union, while using the name "Socialist" as descriptive of the member republics, corresponds to the system that exists in Soviet Russia, and by which the country is managed. This "constitution" says that every law and court decision in a member republic shall be subject to annulment or abridgment by the edicts of the supreme executive authorities of the "union."

Section 18 of article 4 of this "constitution" defines the authority which the soviets at Moscow propose to exercise over the foreign countries that are members of the "union." The section says:

"All decrees and ordinances that determine the general rules of the political and economic life of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and also those that in principle alter the present practices of the state organs of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics must absolutely be laid before the central executive committee of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics for revision and confirmation."

Under this section the laws and ordinances enacted by the legislative bodies of the United States would be subject to "revision and confirmation" of the supreme council of this "union," sitting in Moscow. Section 20 of this "constitution" says further:

"The central executive committee of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics has the right to annul and suspend the decrees, ordinances, and dispositions of the presidium of the central executive committee of the union, as well as those of the soviet congresses and the central executive committees of the federated Republics and of other authorities working within the territory of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics."

Under this section, acts of Congress and the State legislatures, if they continued to exist, would become subject to review by the supreme council of the "union."

As a means of strengthening the revolutionary work in the various countries a "supreme court" of the "union" is established. Its purpose is stated in section 43 of article 7, as follows:

"In order to strengthen the revolutionary code of laws in the territory of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics there is established in connection with the central executive committee of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics a supreme court."

This court, it is stated, is to have power to impart explanations of legislation and examine laws and decisions of national assemblies and courts. Under this arrangement a small revolutionary minority established in control of the Government of the United States, or in any other country, would be supreme in that its decisions and laws, if objected to by the populace, would be referred to the "supreme court" at Moscow, which could revise and confirm them as it wished.

This sort of thing is exactly what the communists in America are aiming at, as demonstrated by their manifestos and communications that have been pouring into the country virtually since the armistice. It is the specific aim and objective of the communist groups that are "boring from within" the United Mine Workers of America and seeking to obtain control of the American Federation of Labor. A world-wide communist organization of miners is being promoted by the communists for this purpose. In the program of action adopted by the communist conference of miners at Pittsburgh on February 10, and presided over by Foster, the following plank was inserted:

"We demand the closest affiliation of the United Mine Workers of America with the organized miners of the world."

This platform also called for the organization of a communist political party, which would amalgamate the farmers and workers into a single unit. That movement is being industriously promoted this year.

The communist movement in the next 12 months will be conducted along more intensive lines than it has at any time in the past. The labor organizations will meet their greatest assaults and attacks, and the communists will make greater efforts than they have at any time in the past to get possession of them. The movement is aimed not only at the labor unions but at the entire industrial, social, and political structure of the country, and with the single aim of eventually establishing a soviet dictatorship in the United States, and converting the country into a vassal colony of the Communist International at Moscow. It is a situation that challenges not only organized labor but every employer as well. This is one occasion when labor and the employer might very well join hands and fight together instead of fighting each other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. ROGERS). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] for one-half hour.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Madam Speaker and Members of the House, I do not come from a mining district. I have no miners living within hundreds of miles of my city. I have made several investigations in the course of the past 23 years that I have been in public office. I have sought always to approach an investigation with an open mind. I candidly state now that, after personally seeing the conditions so graphically described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], who just addressed us, I became partial. Therefore I shall endeavor to state the facts as impartially as a partial observer can state them.

This is a battle of statistics against human life. This is a test between the theories of a new school of coal economics and everyday living conditions of men and women. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] stated the cause of the disturbance, which dates back to the breaking of the so-called Jacksonville agreement, which was effective on April 1, 1924. Mr. Lesher, of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., frankly admitted to me last Saturday that his company broke the agreement before its termination. I do not believe that this is a local question in any sense of the word.

A study or investigation of the coal industry must necessarily take into consideration not only western Pennsylvania but central Pennsylvania, Kentucky, West Virginia, Indiana, and Ohio. I conferred with miners of the union on strike, with nonunion miners, as well as with the representatives of some of the largest coal companies. Taking for granted all that the conditions described by the coal-mine companies are exactly as they state them, still I fail to find justification for the present low rate of wages and the determination to keep these wages down at their present impossible low rate.

According to the statements made to me by the mine owners with whom I conferred and from their attitude, unless the Government intervenes this strike is going to be a long and bitter drawn-out affair, costly and disastrous. The owners justify their attitude and wage reduction on what they call sound economics. I have yet to see a case where figures could not be used to prove either side of the question. Figures and mental experts are always available for both sides of a controversy. I will concede that the soft-coal industry is unstable, that there is keen competition, and that the capacity of the mines of the country is greater than the present needs for soft coal. All that being true, what the mine owners are seeking to do is to take the cost of an unstable industry, of cutthroat competition, and of overproduction out of the wages of the mine workers. In other words, they expect to make the workers digging the coal pay for the deplorable conditions existing in the industry which they, the owners, have brought about. This is, indeed, a new school of economics. To illustrate the mathematics of this new school of coal economics, let me give you the formula on which the present and future wages of the mine workers are to be fixed: They take the return on capital invested, plus profit, plus all overhead expenses, plus depletion, plus depreciation, plus transportation, add them together, subtract it from the present competitive market price of coal, and the remainder is taken as the standard to pay the mine workers. To make it clearer, the actual cost of living and the bare necessaries of life of a miner are entirely disregarded and he is to bear all of the burdens of a demoralized industry and doomed to work for starvation wages. To continue along the lines of the coal economics, in figuring the return on capital investment, interest is computed for 365 days of the year, while the miners are expected to live on a measly pay for only 160 days out of the 365 days. When these coal economists will find a way to make it unnecessary for a miner, his wife, and children to eat the 200 days that he does not work, they will justify their formula, but not until then.

Under the Jacksonville agreement the average earnings of a miner range between $1,050 to $1,200 a year. Under the present wage scale, which incidentally has been reduced three times since the breaking of the Jacksonville agreement, the highest earning will range from $600 to $750 a year, and no family can live decently on that amount in this country.

The factors which have created the unstable conditions in the coal industry must necessarily be charged to the owners of the mines and in no way can the miners or the miners' union be held responsible. The cutthroat competition which prompts this organized and systematic campaign of wage reduction is entirely the fault of the operators themselves. The question of production is likewise due to the waste and bad business management of the coal industry.

Ninety per cent of mining coal is human labor. An industry that can not pay its workers a decent living wage has no right to exist. [Applause.] Efficient operation, economic production, and stabilized prices would provide the mine workers of this country a proper wage scale, permitting them to live decently and happily.

Whether in Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, or West Virginia the terrorism and brutality of mine owners and their agents must cease. The custom of permitting mine owners to uniform, equip, and arm their own police, maintain their own detention pens, and pass summary judgment on the workers is so contrary to the fundamentals of our laws that it becomes necessary for the Federal Government to intervene and put a permanent stop to these outrageous conditions. The mine owners have assumed an extraterritoriality which not even a sovereign State under our Constitution is granted. Sovereign States in our Union are subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution. These mine owners in their territory recognize no limitations.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Please, not now. This fight is not entirely a union fight. It is an organized, systemized campaign of wage reduction. Since the breaking of the agreement in Pennsylvania the wages have been reduced three times in the Pittsburgh district, so that they are now being paid such a low standard of wage that living is impossible. I have here some statements of wages. The men are paid every two weeks. Just listen to these statements, please, and perhaps you will understand why I became so partial to the miners.

Here is one for two weeks, amounting to $39.58. But from this sum of $39.58 is deducted $2.21 for assignment; 30 cents for sharpening miner's tools, smithy work; $5.50 for railroad fare, this man having been brought in from the outside; 50 cents for doctor; 30 cents for the relief fund; $8.30 commissary; electric mine lamp, 60 cents. They deduct from this man's wages for two weeks, in all, $21.80; they deduct that from the $39.58, leaving him a cash balance for two weeks' work of $17.71.

Here is one of the so-called "three pink kisses" statements: At the end of two weeks when the miner has nothing coming to him, the company indicates that by placing on the statement at the place marked "balance due," three red crosses. This is a typical statement, and it is nothing unusual under present conditions for a miner to receive "three pink kisses" at the end of two weeks' work. This boy H. Gabel earned $31.24 in two weeks. From this amount the company charged him 4 cents for smithing; $1.20 for rent; he was charged $30 for moving, making his debt just $31.24, the same as his earnings, leaving him no balance. This means that the man had to draw from the company's stores the food necessary to keep him and his family alive. Therefore next week he will again be indebted to the company, and may run for weeks and weeks before he gets any cash at all in his pay envelope. Here is another statement: This shows that the miner earned $21.48 in the two weeks, and again he is charged with equal amount by the company, leaving him only the three pink kisses for his pay day. In this instance he was charged $1 for assignments, 10 cents for smithing, $9.69 for his tools, $1.85 for powder, $8.23 for board, and 65 cents for an electric mine lamp. I want the Members to note that the miners are required not only to pay for their tools, but also for keeping their tools in condition—that is the item called smithing—and are charged with the cost of the powder used for blasting in the mine. He must also pay for his lamp and for the upkeep or fuel for the lamp, as the case may be. Here is another statement: Each one of these statements is from a different company. This man's name is Jim Harrison. Jim loaded 1,218 hundredweight of coal in his two weeks' period, for which he was credited $39.58. Against this the company debited him as follows: Assignments, $2.21; smithing, 30 cents; railroad fare, $5.50; doctor, 50 cents; relief fund, 30 cents; board or commissaries, $8.30; electric lamp, 60 cents; total, $21.87, leaving Jim a cash balance of $17.71 for two weeks' work.

Here is another good one: Allen Price worked for another of the companies and was permitted to work two days out of two weeks, or, to be exact, two days and one hour, for which he received $9.56; but out of the $9.56 the company charged him 40 cents for coal, $1.03 for explosives, 10 cents for a brass check, 15 cents for a miner's lamp, totaling $1.68. This, deducted from $9.56, left him $7.88 for two weeks. However, according to the company's subtraction on the statement which I hold in my hand they deducted $1.68 for the $9.56 and get a remainder of $6.08, so that our friend Price lost $1.80 owing to the coal company's peculiar mathematics. How this man or any other man can live on $7.88 for two weeks is beyond me or anybody else in this House. Here is a statement which is one of the best showing and, I dare say, about as high as any man can earn in two weeks under the present scale of wages. He totaled for two weeks $43.51, but against this he was charged $7 for rent, $4.76 for coal, 75 cents for doctor, $2 for explosives. However, this man was indebted to the commissary for food for his family, so they charged the balance to that, and he received nothing at the end of two weeks. In this case, too, the man remained in debt to the company and will continue to be in debt owing to the necessity of purchasing food for his family from the company's stores, and while in debt he is not permitted to leave the employ of the company. If this is not peonage, I do not know what it is.

Now, I ask any Member on the floor to tell me how a family can live on the wages paid workers according to the statements that I have read. I would say that the average pay under the present scale of wages will range from $13 to $17 a week. That is putting it very high. I hold here in my hand, gentlemen, a photograph showing a typical miner's family. Here is the mother with her seven little children, graduating in size from, I would say, 1 year to about 10. They stand next to their poor belongings, which have just been thrown out of the company's home from which they have been evicted. How can any man support a wife and four or five children on $13 a week?

This wage condition and the dire destitution of the miners who are working under the present wage scale is not only prevalent in the western district of Pennsylvania but in other sections of the country where soft coal is mined. Let me pause just long enough from Pennsylvania to read a letter received from a miner in Eckman, W. Va.:

MR LA GUARDIA.
Congressman from N. Y.
Washington

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN

having seen in the paper what you are doing for the Penna coal miner and know that your heart is in the right place, I am just wondering if you would think that I was trying to over do matters by asking you to considire the situation of southwestern West. Va. The situation here is almost as critical as in the Pennsa coal fields, tho there is no strike here "only strife" One or two days per week is all the time a workman generly gets, I am a coal miner and thirty five dollars is as much as I have been able to make in any two weeks for a long time, and to prove to you just how tight they are in this part of the country, at one time just before Christmas I was out of mens had nothing whatever except three cars of coal that was standing at the tipple waiting to be dumped, I ask the store manager if he would credit me to one pound of lard and he very rudely refused me, and this same man some time since then short changed my seven year old boy for 25 cents these are a few of the things that a coal miner faces in Mcdowell County W. Va. I am employed by the Eureka Coal & Coke Co, of Eckman * * * one thing more, the coal operators here are so organized that a man cant get a letter to Washington or any where else if it looks the least bit suspicious.

Thanking you I remain,

Yours Very truly W. C. AUSTIN

Now, so much as was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] as to the coal and iron police, I need not repeat, but I simply want to state that there is nothing in the origin of the law under which they operate which gives these men the authority which they assume. They were uniformed; they wear military uniforms, Sam Brown belts, armed with an automatic revolver and a club, and this [exhibiting] is one of the badges which they wear. They are paid by the mining company, they are commanded by the mining company, and they are under absolute orders from the mining company, ostensibly for the purpose of protecting property, and are responsible to no one else. I have ascertained—and it is a matter of daily and hourly occurrence—that they do not limit their activities to the protection of the mining property. They do not remain on the mining property, but they go out on the highways of the State and there they apprehend these men who have left the company and are indebted to the company. They exercise a brutality that I have never heard of in the United States or any other country, either now or in the past history of the world; and that is covering a lot of territory.

Now, gentlemen, this condition exists all through the coal-mining States—Kentucky, West Virginia, Indiana, Ohio—so that it becomes necessary for a Federal investigation to seek to coordinate these various sections and to seek to stabilize this industry.

Now, not only are these men being exploited, but here is a picture of a typical strike breaker that they have imported from the South. These colored men—these poor boys—are now kept in a veritable state of peonage. They are charged with their railroad fare and with their board and with their expenses. They are kept indebted to the company, and they are not permitted to leave. They are kept on the property by sheer force of the private police.

A MEMBER. That is a violation of the peonage law?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. I am relating these conditions in this connection for that very purpose. I am seeking to show that it is a violation of the peonage law and therefore within the province of a congressional investigation.

Mr. QUIN. May I ask the gentleman if the public is being robbed in the price of coal?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that the passenger rates on railroads were based on the cost of coal mined under a decent wage scale, and that now the railroad companies are paying one-half of what they had been paying for their coal, and yet the previous price of coal is reflected in the present cost of freight and passenger transportation.

Now, gentlemen, not only are the strike breakers being worked and paid a disgracefully low rate of wages, but the conditions under which mine companies permit them to live is degrading and debauching. Conditions in these strike breakers' mining camps are anything but wholesome and healthful. All of this is tolerated by the mining companies. Gentlemen, the worst kind of poison hootch is sold to these strike breakers and United States Government officials are compelled to wait the pleasure of the private police—these coal and iron police that we are talking about—before they are permitted to enter the company's property and go to the places where the law is being violated. Needless to say that by the time they get there everything has been cleared away and everybody gone. On pay nights carloads of unfortunate degraded women, black and white, are taken to the camp. I have here photostatic copy of the record of one of the squire's courts. It shows the conviction of two unfortunate women who pleaded guilty to keeping and maintaining a disorderly house. The significant thing is that their fine was paid by the iron and coal police of the companies representing the coal-mine company. Here, gentlemen, are the two photostatic copies of the court record.

Here is a photograph of a family being evicted loading their poor belongings on a truck to take to the strikers' barracks. A great deal has been said by the companies about the eviction of the union miners. During my visit in the coal district of Pittsburgh I noted that the officials of each company were particular to emphasize that it was the other companies who were brutal and heartless. Each charged the other. In that respect I think they were correct. Two of the companies with whose officers I conferred ask me to distinguish each of the companies in relating or recording abuse of miners in eviction or sale of furniture. I regret that I can not do that. Time would only permit me to look at the situation as a whole, taking the miners on one side, all of the coal operators and the strike breakers, and treat the subject as whole. However, the photographs which I have and my memoranda will enable proper identification of the misdeeds of the various companies at any time that it should be required.

Here is a photograph showing that not only were miners evicted, but that their furniture, their household furniture, was levied and seized by the constable and sold at public auction. Let me read this notice of a constable's sale which I now hold in my hand. The plaintiff in the action is the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Co. The defendant is Alex Renish. The constable's notice of sale is dated Mount Lebanon, Pa., December 6, 1927. All the property of this unfortunate defendant, Renish, the notice proclaims, was seized and taken in execution by the constable. The sale was scheduled to take place on the 12th day of December, 1927, at 2.30 p. m., at 207 House Coverdale, Pa. This is what the company seized from their former employee and sold at public auction: 1 stove, 1 cabinet, 1 table, 1 sewing machine, 3 chairs, 1 Maytag washer, 1 heat stove, 1 upholstered living-room suite, 1 chiffonier, 6 chairs, 2 beds, and—please note this—"all other salable goods on the premises." In my State, and I dare say in the majority of the States of the Union, such necessary household furniture is not subject to levy and execution. And there are very few even hard-hearted landlords who would go to such an extreme. Lest it should be said that this is an exceptional case, I have here in my hand a photograph of a large tree in the Pittsburgh coal district on which are posted no less than six notices of such constable's sales of seized furniture levied on execution at the instance of the mining companies. During my tour of the various towns my attention was called to scores and scores of such notices plastered on the walls, on trees, and everywhere.

Here is a photograph, gentlemen, showing how these imported strike breakers are quartered in some of the mines. This apparently is an old abandoned day coach converted into sleeping barracks for colored strike breakers.

Talking about the colored strike breakers, I want to relate an instance which I gathered from witnesses who have talked to these men. One night some 25 of these colored strike breakers attended a union meeting. Word got to the camp, and when they returned they were met by the coal and iron police, handcuffed, and then beaten. They were then detained in one of the private jails of the coal companies until the "judge" arrived, the judge being no judge at all, but the superintendent of the company, acting in the capacity of a judge. Just think! Their own private police, their own private jail, and their own private judge. The judge proceeded to question these men and then asked one of the coal and iron police officers to pull out his gun. The judge asked these men collectively if they knew what it was. Oue big colored boy stood up and says, "Yes, sah; I knows what it is. I's learned what it was in the A. E. F., and what's more, I's going, and you can shoot me down, but I's going," and he went. Outside he was met by Mr. McCory, of the New York Daily News, and told his story. The man was then bleeding and bruised from the beating he had just received. And if there is an investigation, Mr. McCory can testify to this incident.

Here, gentlemen, is an instance where the company did not evict. They could not evict, it seems. They wanted to get the striker out of the house, so what did they do? The photograph I hold here will show that they built a scaffold and ripped part of the roof over the bedroom right out. This other photograph that I have will show you the inside of the room, with the roof torn out and the rain leaking in. Needless to say the family moved out.

Here, gentlemen, let me show you this photograph. This picture indicates an elderly man evidently in his sixties—surely not a husky—and his face would indicate that the many, many years of coal mining is telling of its hardships; and here is another picture of this same man showing his skull cracked by the famous iron and coal police.

Gentlemen, not only have they brought down to a disgraceful rate the wages, but these men are degraded in living conditions.

Mr. BOWLING. Are the squires on the pay roll of the company, too?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is no court at all. They have their own private detention camps.

Mr. BOWLING. The gentleman said something about somebody holding court.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Some of them, of course, are controlled by the mining companies; one or two are independent, fearless, and honest.

Mr. CASEY. Let me add, without fear of contradiction, that these squires are on the pay rolls of the companies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, gentlemen, as to the injunction referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not know whether he mentioned it or not, but the injunction not only restrains them from defending themselves in court, retaining attorneys, or paying strike benefits, but restrains them from collecting on the lots of churches and restrains them from singing hymns.

Mr. CASEY. Will not the gentleman place in the RECORD the name of the minister, because so much has been said about these men being a lot of aliens and anarchists. The minister's name is Reverend Phillips, of the Magyar Presbyterian Church.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman. Now, gentlemen, we have this condition. It is conceded there is too much coal production; it is conceded, gentleman, that there are too many miners, yet we are creating a condition wherein the operators are bringing into the field some 45,000 or 50,000 more miners. With this system of peonage and this system of wage reduction, naturally that is going to reflect all through the labor markets of the United States. I repeat that the American standard of living is entirely disregarded. Gentlemen, you can not imagine a more pathetic sight than that which I saw. On one side of the road the houses of the mining company vacated and boarded up, and across the street, where the miners were compelled to lease ground, the dismal barracks in which each miner's family is living in two rooms. Yet you go into these dismal barracks and you will find them immaculately clean. These men are not fighting for a whim; these men are not fighting for any false idea. Gentlemen, they are simply fighting to get enough to eat for themselves and their children.

What will be the far-reaching result of this mine condition? The time is not distant when every self-respecting railroad man will refuse to operate a train that burns the coal mined under such disgraceful conditions. [Applause.] This is going to branch out; this has ramifications; it can not endure; no American family can live on $13 or $14 a week.

I spoke to one old man there who came from Tuscany, and had been working in the same mine since 1888. On the day I was talking to him, last Friday, it was the second anniversary of the death of his son, who had lost his life in an explosion in that mine. Those men belong to the mine; they have invested their life in the mine; they have as great a vested interest in that mine as any bondholder or stockholder has. [Applause.] Their very life is invested in that mine; they have an attachment for it, and yet it is sought to take their places by placing others to be exploited and made even more miserable.

I want to pause just a minute to give credit to the New York Daily News for furnishing this documentary and photographic evidence. I want to say that the Daily News, published by the owners of the Chicago Tribune, is not by any means a radical paper. When they went to the mines they went there with an open mind, and they found the conditions so intolerable and so incredible and have frankly so stated. They have rendered a great public service to the American people by exposing the facts. [Applause.]

Now, just one more case. I want to point out that even the unfortunate strike breakers are living under intolerable conditions. One family was brought there, a man, wife, and children. He was charged, I think, some $45 for his railroad fare; he worked there weeks and weeks and finally they stopped his credit at the commissary, or the company's store, because he had not earned enough, and on the 24th of December, on Christmas Eve, when he went home his wife said to him, "John, they have stopped our credit again," and they had nothing to eat on Christmas Day, after working several weeks as a strike breaker. These may seem sentimental or some may call it sob stuff, but I tell you, gentlemen, it grips one and makes any red-blooded man indignant.

Ordinarily a labor dispute is so localized in one State that it is not the province of the Federal Government to intervene. In the case of the soft-coal strike, however, there are many compelling reasons which make either a House or senatorial investigation imperative to be followed by necessary governmental intervention. It is no longer a matter of adjustment between the workers and employers; it has become a national problem and must be treated accordingly.

The arming and equipment of private police officers under absolute control and orders of mine owners, acting and exercising authority beyond the private property of the mines, making arrests, bringing them into privately owned places of detention, is not only contrary to law but to the Constitution.

Whether union workers or strike breakers, it is a matter of national concern that these men should be enabled to live decently and enjoy the freedom which the Constitution of this country guarantees to them.

It is a matter for congressional investigation to investigate the charge that a system of peonage now exists in the soft-coal regions in the various States. The statutes of the United States provide that—

> The holding of any person to service or labor under the system known as peonage is abolished and forever prohibited in any Territory or State of the United States—and it is declared that any agreement made for services to liquidate any debt or for compulsory continued service is null and void. I am not reading this from the by-laws of the United Mine Workers, but from the Revised Statutes of the United States. Let me read another section of the United States laws, which, it is charged, has been violated:

> Whoever shall knowingly and willingly bring into the United States any person inveigled in any other country with intent to hold such person so inveigled in confinement or to any involuntary servitude shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than five years.

A large number of Mexicans were actually inveigled down in Mexico and brought to these coal mines, and only through the intervention of the Mexican consul were they released and sent back home. An offense against the Federal laws has been committed which justify Federal investigation and intervention.

Here is another one: The strike breakers are kept on mine territory. If they seek to leave, they are pursued by the coal and iron police out and beyond mine property, taken from the public highways, arrested, and brought back, all in violation of section 444 of title 18 of the United States Code, which provides:

> Whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage shall be fined and imprisoned.

This is a daily occurrence in the coal districts that I visited. Now let me read you this one:

> Whoever obstructs or attempts to obstruct or in any way interferes with or prevents the enforcement of the antipeonage law commits a felony and is subject to fine and imprisonment.

Yet these private, uniformed, and armed army of the mine owners are daily doing this very thing, and when a local officer issues a warrant against any of these agents of the mine owners the mine owners simply refuse to produce them. That, I submit, is another reason justifying an investigation.

The present railroad rates have been fixed on the basis of coal cost, based on a decent living wage to the miners ranging between $2.20 to $2.40 a ton for coal. Under the present peonage system of mining, in which the railroads have taken a very important part, they are now paying $1.60 to $1.75 a ton, although the former American rate of wages continues to be reflected in freight and passenger rates.

It is a matter of national concern that the soft-coal industry be stabilized until Federal intervention can coordinate the mines in the various States and bring about the required stabilization.

The life and existence of a million people comprising the mine workers and their families located in five or six States of the Union is naturally a matter of concern for the Federal Government.

Gentlemen, this can not endure. I have said and will repeat and will close by saying that these miners are a great deal different from some of us. They are attached to the place where they have worked all their lives. They do not migrate. They have not the diversified interests that people generally have. They are different in almost every way from us except that they, too, have a natural love for their children, just as much as we have and just as much as the directors of the mine companies have. They are simply putting up a game fight for the lives of these children.

Oh, I have heard it said many times that we should not bring the children into it. You can not take the children out of it. The mine operators have taken away their homes. They have taken away their jobs. They have taken away the morsel of bread from their mouths, but the miners have retained their souls. I appeal to you, gentlemen, to put aside statistics, to put aside returns, and to rally back of a resolution to give these people some help and the assurance of a square deal. [Applause.]

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, the next item in the Army appropriation bill is one in which all of the Members are interested to some extent. It has been delayed for a considerable time. I want to be assured that all have an opportunity to hear the discussion, and while I regret to inconvenience Members, I nevertheless call attention to the doubt of whether there is a quorum present, and I demand the presence of a quorum.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment? I want to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes, and I am willing to accept the membership we have here now. If the gentleman will withhold his point until after I get through my remarks, I will appreciate it.

Mr. SPEAKS. If I am entitled to press my demand for a quorum later, I will yield to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. SPEAKS. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we are informed through the columns of the daily papers that the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, responding to the pressure of the farmers of the Southern States, has unanimously passed a resolution asking the Congress of the United States to investigate the New York Cotton Exchange and to put a stop to those iniquitous practices which are now depriving the cotton farmers of the products of their toil.

Mr. Speaker, the cotton market is one of the most sensitive elements, I will say, in American life. Go into the New York Stock Exchange and to the average American it looks like a bedlam. Around a circle a great number of men are scrambling and bidding and offering cotton for sale. Finally, when a man makes a deal with another, the noise is so great it can not be transmitted by word of mouth, but a man standing in the well with a white glove on his hand will transmit that message to a man on the platform who delivers it over a telephone to the man who is checking it up on the board.

Suppose a sale is made of 1,000 bales of cotton at 17.45. The moment that figure is checked up on the board, it is flashed on to the board of every cotton exchange in America, and possibly throughout the world. At that moment that becomes the price and goes out as the price cotton is selling for at that particular time on the New York market. Certain manipulators whose names will be developed before this Congress adjourns have recently concentrated in New York between 140,000 and 200,000 bales of low-grade cotton. Just why the New York Exchange would permit these men to offer on the exchange cotton that is not really spinnable, and does not measure up to the standard is a mystery to me.

A man comes in who is a spinner, we will say, a man who is legitimately engaged in the cotton industry. He goes on to the exchange to buy 10,000 bales of cotton. Cotton is selling, we will say, at 20 cents a pound, but to his surprise, a man rises up over here and says, "I offer for immediate delivery 10,000 bales at 19½ cents." The speculator who is on to the particular firms that have this low-grade cotton and are using it on the New York exchange to manipulate the price does not bid, but the innocent purchaser, the spinner, if you please, who is interested, says, "Here is a good chance for me to get my cotton," and he buys it; but when he goes to sample that cotton he finds he can not use it. What does he do? He is bound to come back on the exchange and retender that cotton at a reduced price in order to get rid of it, so that he may purchase cotton from some one that is offering spinnable cotton for sale.

Whenever the time comes that it is necessary to depress the price of cotton to carry out their iniquitous scheme, these manipulators offer more of this unspinnable cotton for sale.

A Member of this House received a few days ago a letter from a firm in his State, or a man in his State, giving this astounding information: One of these firms controlling this great bulk of low-grade cotton wrote and asked how much cotton was on hand in that locality, what were the conditions of the people who were holding it, and how much it would be necessary to depress the market in order to wring it out of their hands.

This has been going on since January, 1927. They have depressed the price in such a way as to rob the cotton growers of hundreds of millions of dollars, and have driven it from 23 cents a pound down to about 17 cents a pound, and are now gloating over their exploit.

I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement on this proposition that I want every Member of the House to read. If every man in the American Congress understood what is going on in the manipulation of the price of cotton we would have no trouble in carrying out the request of the members of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi to investigate the New York Exchange and to investigate those who have entered into this iniquitous conspiracy to destroy the price of American cotton.

I am not going to take up any more time of the House if I may have consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD this statement, which goes into details on this proposition, and in that way give the facts to the Congress and to the American people. [Applause.]

The statement is as follows:

The acceptance of undesirable spinning character on contract serves to equip the manipulator with his most effective bludgeon for depressing prices, and not only enables him to prosecute his large straddle operations to a successful and profitable conclusion, but also on account of the custom of country merchants in the South of selling cotton during the active crop-moving period to a considerable extent to the agents of the large manipulators on what is known as "on call" or "sliding scale terms" basis future quotations and the buyer having the option to call or fix the price, the buyer naturally exercises this option to his decided advantage during period of depression in contract prices, many of which are engineered by the manipulative activities of the buyer himself.

Appended hereto will be found a statement of "cotton classed at New York from August, 1926, to January, 1928," including "transfers," prepared and furnished upon request by the Department of Agriculture. This statement shows both the amount of cotton certificated locally in New York as well as cotton certificated in other contract markets, principally in New Orleans, and transferred to the New York market and known as "transfer" cotton during the period described.

It will be seen that there was a total of 139,276 bales of "transfer" cotton shipped to New York during the entire period in question, and that the bulk of this cotton arrived in New York between the 17th day of September, 1926, and the 25th day of March, 1927, inclusive—viz, approximately 125,000 bales. It will also be seen that before these shipments commenced the New York stock had declined to about 23,000 bales but that within six months thereafter, or by March 25, 1927, it had been increased to about 195,000 bales, or total certifications, including local certificates, of about 170,000 bales, of which all but about 45,000 bales consisted of "transfer" cotton shipped mostly from New Orleans.

That these shipments of transfer cotton to New York were intended purely for manipulative purposes will be clearly seen from observation of the dates upon which it was received in New York, and the relative price at which the near position in the respective future markets of New York and New Orleans were trading, as shown:

From the above tabulation it will be noticed that during the period of the heaviest transfers the New Orleans market ranged at a slight premium over and above the New York market, and that only during a few weeks during October and December, 1926, was there any premium in New York over the corresponding position in New Orleans, the widest premium during these few weeks being only 35 points, whereas it requires a shipping parity of 85 points between the two markets to ship and deliver on New York. As already pointed out, the great bulk of this transfer cotton was shipped to New York when the differences were approximately even to a slight premium on New Orleans over New York, nevertheless this cotton was shipped at an average obvious loss of 85 points, or $4.25 per bale. Why would anyone deliberately ship cotton and sustain such a loss except for the purpose of manipulating and depressing the market to which it was shipped, as is evidenced by the fact that practically all of this cotton still remains in the New York stock and has been dumped and redumped on the market there during the past 10 or 12 months?

The following are some extracts from an address delivered during April, 1926, as reported in the April 10 issue of that year of the Cotton Trade Journal, which address was made at the second annual convention of the American Cotton Shippers' Association at Atlanta, Ga., on April 9, by one of the star manipulators of the cotton market, the object of which address was to justify the ethics of a "squeeze" which had been conducted by the manipulator in question on the March position of the year before:

"To those members of the cotton trade who have kept well informed on the subject, reference to the 'manipulators' of March New York is practically equivalent to the publication of my firm's name as the principals in that operation.

"During the summer and early fall of last year, March New York, under the shadow of a very large stock which the trade anticipated would be attracted to New York by the December operation, was sold heavily by speculators and by straddlers and hedgers, with the result that this position for many consecutive weeks ruled much below a proper parity with spot cotton in the South, and within 10 to 20 points off March New Orleans, whereas a shipping parity is about 85 points.

"Why should anyone sell March New York at 15 points over March New Orleans, when it costs about 85 points to make delivery? The only answer is to be found in the general assumption that some one had already planned to attract to New York so much cotton on December that nobody could afford to receive it on March except at a discount under May, and at an attractive level under southern values.

"The October-December operation last season is a concrete example. October, 1924, when practically all cotton was tenderable, went to a premium of about 100 points over December and attracted a stock of 175,000 bales to New York; and under the weight of this cotton, December sold at 40 to 50 points under December New Orleans, whereas the normal parity should be 75 to 85 points over December New Orleans. It also sold at a low parity with Liverpool and with spots in the various southern markets.

"No one complained of manipulation that year, except a few daring ones who stayed short of October too long, because it was the brand of manipulation that nine out of ten traders depend upon for supplying New York with an ample stock to make safe their speculative short sales, short hedges against stocks of spot cotton, and straddle operations with the short end in New York and the long end in other future markets.

"Does anyone fail to see that this choice gives an enormous advantage to any firm placed in the position of exercising it?

"We must be excused if we fail to feel any sense of commercial perversion in continuing to play the game according to the rules."

The following is an extract from an article on the New York cotton market, published under date of October 19, 1927, by the cotton editor of the New York Journal of Commerce:

"The extraordinary spot basis stands out in sharp relief. New York contracts at $6 per bale under the price for middling seven-eighths of an inch cotton in the Atlantic markets have a strange look. New York, for some reason inscrutable to many, is to all appearances the cheapest market in the world. Such an anomaly is regretted by some reflective people. They fear that it may make New York a target for criticism."

It is evident from this that this journal which reflects the sentiment of the members of the New York Cotton Exchange was fearful of the exchange being placed in an embarrassing position as a result of this glaring manipulation.

MANIPULATORS DISLODGE SOUTHERN HOLDERS OF COTTON

The foundation of the bear campaign of the past four months in the cotton market was laid during the winter and spring of 1926-27 by the accumulation during that period of a large stock in New York, approximately 200,000 bales, consisting principally of soft and wasty and generally undesirable character cotton, commonly known as "punk." The bulk of this cotton, or, to be specific, about 140,000 bales, were classed and certificated in New Orleans and shipped to New York, in spite of a loss in doing so of about $5 per bale; the shippers and deliverers on New York incurring this loss deliberately, with the confident knowledge that the cotton was so undesirable as to constitute, together with its bulk, one of the most effective weapons of pressure that the New York market had seen for a number of years, and it was calculated by the manipulators that the delivery of this cotton in New York would readily justify the loss involved in its shipment, whereby keeping it intact there as long as necessary the purposes of these operators would be effectively served.

That the great bulk of this stock is composed of undesirable character and virtually despised by spinners is amply evidenced by the fact that this stock has remained in New York for over a year, in spite of the cotton in question being the cheapest in the world, apparently, viz, available for export to Europe for quite a period at a price as much as $6 to $7 per bale below spot values of the same description of cotton in the South, and at no time less than $2.50 to $3 per bale in favor of New York versus the southern value, although during the period in question the world's consumption of American cotton was establishing new high records. Therefore, during this entire period of over a year this stock in New York served absolutely no other purposes whatsoever than fitting or dovetailing completely and most effectively into the schemes of the manipulators.

Last fall, when the approximate size of this season's production became generally well known, it was announced by several of the admittedly best schools of economists of the country that cotton this season, giving due consideration to the production and the carry-over—that is, the total supply in relation to the world's indicated consumption—should command a price between 20 and 32 cents, and, theoretically speaking, the forecast of these economists were entirely reasonable; the only element of error in their calculations was that, owing to the peculiar technique of the market, they overlooked the size of the stock in New York and the heavy preponderance of undesirable cotton it contained and, hence, could not visualize or foresee what an important factor of depression this stock constituted. But the overwhelming depressing influence of this stock in what is generally admitted by all odds to be the greatest future trading market in the world was clearly foreshadowed during last fall, when, in spite of a distinct tendency on decreasing crop prospects simultaneously coupled with constantly increasing consumption (during September to December, 1927, consumption establishing new high world's records), prices, as reflected by the New York exchange were exhibiting a continually sagging tendency and since September have shrunk over 8 cents per pound, or some $40 per bale, and about $20 per bale below what the reputable economists foresaw as the approximate intrinsic value of middling cotton this season. In other words, all logical and even scientific deductions as to proper intrinsic values which cotton should have commanded this season have been utterly defied and made to look ludicrous by the operations of the manipulators using this large stock of spinner-despised cotton as a sledge hammer for unsettling and depressing prices.

During the past week these great manipulators have played in the dual stellar rôle of manipulator and accumulator. Until recently, all through the severe decline in prices, the farmer or his agents, the cooperatives and country merchants had bravely and tenaciously held on to their cotton in what appeared to them the justifiable hope that the decline would long since have culminated and prices rise again to reasonable levels; but the decline has become so severe and searching, by reason of the pressure brought about by the manipulative accumulators, these holders have become unnerved and panicky, and the banks financing their cotton have admonished them to sell, fearing still lower levels, with the result that their cotton has been wrested from them at the bottom of the decline, whereupon the manipulators have stepped in, playing the rôle of accumulators, and taken hundreds of thousands of bales off their hands, the final result of which program is that not only has this cotton been dislodged from the farmers' hands at ruinously low prices, and for his efforts and determination in holding the farmer is further punished by becoming the inheritor of all the charges of carrying this cotton for five or six months. Below are quoted several extracts from the news of the day bearing on this subject:

From the New York Journal of Commerce, issue February 4, 1928:

"The technical position was better here and the spot situation at the South is said to have been relieved this week by heavy sales by the western cooperative associations. There was even a story that they had sold something like 100,000 bales to Houston interests."

Further, from the Dow, Jones ticker, date of February 3, 1928:

"Lines of 'call' cotton bought from merchants and farmers considerably reduced since Monday, January 30."

It will be noticed in the above quotation reference is made to "call" cotton bought from merchants and farmers. The cooperatives and country merchants in the South are accustomed to selling or making contracts during the active crop-moving period to a large extent with the agents of the large manipulators on what is known as "on call" or "sliding scale" terms, based on New York future quotations, the buyer securing the option to call or fix price whenever possible, and therefore the buyer, viz, manipulator, through the depressive influence exercised by him via the large stock of undesirable cotton in New York controlled by him, often manufactures, so to speak, the level of price at which he fixes the price of his "call" contracts with the coopera-tives and country merchants, an instance in point being clearly demonstrated during the past week.

Cotton of seven-eighths inch length in staple, and of fair average to good spinning character constitutes the great bulk of our cotton crops. It might be said that the proportion of this description of cotton contained in the average crop bears the same relation to the total production as the proportion of the "common people" in the country bear to the total population. Therefore, this cotton has come to be known generally in the trade as "bread-and-butter" cotton; for just as bread and butter is the principal food of the common people, so this sort of cotton furnishes the "food" of the majority of the world's spindles consuming American cotton.

It would hardly be any exaggeration to state that the supply of and demand for this kind of cotton represents about 85 per cent or more each, respectively, of the United States Cotton Belt's productive capacity and the world's consumptive requirements. Therefore, the characterization of it as "bread-and-butter" cotton would seem very appropriate as fittingly descriptive of its predominant function in the world's trade.

Is it not therefore entirely consonant with the best economic principles that the cotton trade in seeking to establish a suitable standard to represent staple and character to act as the basis of value for the futures contract markets, should select a type or standard as truly representative as possible of the staple and character of the great bulk of the cotton produced in the average crop? Not only so that future contracts may reflect as closely as possible the intrinsic value of that kind of cotton which constitutes this great bulk and avoiding abnormal disparities in the relationship between spot values as reflected in the cash markets in the South and future contract values as expressed by the quotations prevailing on the exchanges, but for other important reasons as well.

The manufacturing element in the trade, on account of the great supply of this so-called "bread-and-butter" cotton, has educated the consuming world by reason of its relative price advantage in consideration of quality furnished, to demand cotton goods manufactured out of this cotton.

The remaining odd 15 per cent contained in our cotton crops is represented largely by staple length of fifteen-sixteenths inch and better and of character equal or superior to that shown in the supply of seven-eighths inch already described, while the supply of cotton below seven-eighths inch and of undesirable spinning character in most crops is really insignificant, probably seldom exceeding 3 to 4 per cent, sometimes less.

There seems to be current in some sections of the Cotton Belt the belief that by demanding only such cotton as will meet a certain minimum standard of character and staple desirability, a hardship is visited upon those communities that may happen to produce a disproportionately large quantity of this undesirable spinning quality—in other words, disfranchising this cotton; but from a broad viewpoint of the situation in its entirety and from the standpoint of conserving the best interests of by far the large majority of producers and others concerned, this is a dangerous economic fallacy. For example, the New York market rarely, if ever, absorbs for delivery on contract, even in years of large production, more than 125,000 to 200,000 bales maximum, many seasons much less, as it has been ascertained by the large interests who invariably manipulate the New York market, that a contract stock of the dimensions described above, provided it contains, which it usually does, a sufficient percentage of undesirable character cotton commonly known as "punky" staple and "wasty" character, is ample to protect the interests of these manipulators, as they have long since found that there is a very close mathematical relationship between the following factors:

(a) The size of the New York stock in bales of certificated cotton.

(b) The percentage of undesirable character contained in this stock.

(c) The extent to which the basis middling price—i. e., the current contract quotations as expressed on the New York figures—can be depressed.

These big manipulators have the equation worked out to almost mathematical precision. Almost identically to the same extent that the New York stock is saturated or polluted with this undesirable cotton through the temporary prevalence of fictitious values on New York for that particular description of cotton, subject, of course, to minor variations from time to time as to the degree of undesirability, there is and unfailingly must be a compensational adjustment or depression of contract values on this New York Exchange, resulting in debasement of contract values there, which on account of the enormous amount of purely "in-and-out" trading in futures on this exchange, unfortunately and unjustly set the price standard for the entire cotton crop, or at least the 85 per cent already referred to, and constitutes an organized form of robbery of the producer on a wholesale scale. This is an economic truism that can not be effectively disputed.

This process is further augmented and abetted by the large interests who control the policy of this exchange by various ingenious schemes and devices adopted into the by-laws and rules of said exchange, such, for instance:

By the rotating device or system of tendering and constantly retendering certificated cotton through notices of delivery between themselves, comanipulators, and brokers acting as their agents, the effect of which is to bring about repeated forced sales of the entire New York stock over and over again, the depressing and unwholesome effect of which practice upon price levels is not hard to estimate. Likewise by the enactment of rules in the exchange of other devices calculated to create a reluctance on the part of would-be receivers, especially nonmembers, to "take up" cotton on these contracts, viz, imposing prohibitive spot commission which must be paid by anyone receiving this contract cotton—i. e., a spot commission of 15 points or 75 cents per bale, which is in addition to the original commission charged by the brokers for buying and selling futures. On all confirmations of executions rendered to their clients by these commission houses the following clause is distinctly stipulated:

"All orders for the purchase or sale of cotton for future delivery are received and executed with the distinct understanding that actual delivery is contemplated."

The object of this clause naturally is intended to convey that the transaction in question is a bona fide purchase or sale of actual cotton for the purpose of giving the contract the necessary validity to make it enforceable in the courts and remove any possibility of stigmatism of a gambling nature or interpretation being placed upon the contract in question.

Now, as the commission house charges, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the exchange, an original commission of 5 points or 25 cents per bale for the round transaction of buying and selling, and, as their understanding between themselves and their clients is to the effect that an actual delivery will take place, nevertheless, inasmuch as they are compelled to charge an additional commission of 15 points or 75 cents per bale in the event the buyer elects to receive or take physical delivery of the cotton purchased, these commission houses in effect being compelled to say to their clients as follows:

"We have bought this cotton for you in accordance with your instructions, and, although the contract contemplates an actual delivery, if you elect to liquidate the obligation by a corresponding sale before delivery date or maturity of the option, the commission shall only be 5 points or 25 cents per bale; but, on the other hand, should you elect to take delivery as the contract contemplates, we shall be compelled, in order to keep within the rules of the exchange, to penalize you by making an additional charge of 15 points or 75 cents per bale; in other words, if you dare to demand delivery of the actual cotton, you must pay a fine of 75 cents per bale in addition to the original commission for buying of 2½ points, or 12½ cents per bale, or a combined charge of 17½ points equals 87½ cents per bale."

The above is not intended as any reflection upon the commission houses themselves as attempting to extort an exorbitant commission, but merely to demonstrate the effect of the commission rule in question as adopted into the rules and maintained there by those who control the general policy of the exchange; as a matter of fact, on account of the general antipathy toward this contract cotton itself, and the prohibitive charges involved in receiving this cotton by nonmembers of the exchange, the extent to which these commission houses benefit by these exorbitant commission charges is practically negligible, and a full statement to the above-quoted effect on the confirmation of execution issued by these commission houses would not have a wholesome aspect, hence they assiduously refrain from any remarks as to the commission involved in the transaction, and merely state that "it shall be in strict conformity in all respects to the rules, regulations, and customs of the New York Cotton Exchange, the United States cotton futures act," etc.

This in spite of the fact that involved in the actual delivery of contract cotton, no additional service is performed on behalf of their clients, other than the partial financing of the cotton for which all interest charges are for account of the receiver, and the mere exchange of documents necessary to accomplish the transaction and some trifling clerical work entailed in calculation of the other fixed charges, such as warehouse, insurance, inspection, classification, etc., all of which are also for account of the receiver, in addition to the commission and penalty (so-called spot commission) for receiving the cotton, the same having already been classified and certified by the United States Department of Agriculture, thus relieving said commission houses of any expense, responsibility, or service of consequence whatever as ordinarily associated with the necessary classification of cotton when purchased and taken up in the spot markets in the South.

This spot charge of 75 cents per bale, in addition to the buying commission of 12½ cents per bale, unescapable by all nonmembers who may receive or contemplate receiving cotton on future contracts, constitutes a burden and obstruction upon interstate commerce and provides the manipulating element with an additional strangle hold on the certificated stock in that market, while the manipulator by reason of his membership in the exchange and equipment for handling this cotton has the distinct advantage of escaping this unjust so-called "spot commission." No such commission charges are imposed on the Chicago Board of Trade for receiving grain against future-delivery options.

With further regard to the exclusion of undesirable cotton from delivery on contract, while this may at times exert a trifling hardship upon a relatively few producers as affecting or disfranchising only an almost insignificant quantity of the total production, the admission of delivery of this undesirable quality through its depressing influence on the basis middling value serves to severely penalize millions and millions of bales of desirable cotton.

[NOTE.—Congress has legislated that manipulating is illegal in primary commodity markets (see United States grain futures act, September, 1922) and the Supreme Court has duly affirmed the constitutionality of such legislation on the ground that manipulation is inimical to the national public interest, which is preeminent.]

For what good reason has cotton, one of the major primary commodity markets, been neglected or rather allowed to remain unprotected from manipulation, as the consideration of national public interests are surely equally true of cotton as of the grain markets?

This being the case, the cotton exchanges should be so regulated as to effectively prohibit manipulation or attempted manipulation, so that the operations of such exchanges shall not come into conflict with the said national public interest as they are doing at present.

Private institutions, operating as cotton exchanges, where the self-interests of their own memberships naturally predominate, can not be seriously expected, without suitable controlling legislation, to properly conserve the rights of the public.

The way is clear. Apply the principles of the Capper-Tincher law to the cotton exchanges, thereby expressly prohibiting manipulation.

The enactment of the United States grain futures act of September, 1922 (Capper-Tincher law), was followed about a year later by one of the most active and largest bull markets ever witnessed during peace times, and also a bull market with great activity the succeeding year, although prices were of somewhat more moderate proportions, proving, however, that the enactment of this legislation against manipulation in no way interfered with the normal activity of the market.

The national public interest is at stake and should not be permitted to be frustrated by the existing system in cotton, so that those who have spent their life's energies in the industry, whether farmer, spinner, or merchant, may not continue to pay toll to the manipulators and be cheated out of their birthright and results of honest efforts and investments.

W. L. C., April 10, 1926.

Why should anyone sell March New York at 15 points over March New Orleans when it costs 85 points to make delivery?

OCTOBER, NOVEMBER, DECEMBER, 1926 (by same token).

Why was cotton received on October and December (1926) New Orleans at prices even with to a premium of 25 points over October and December New York and shipped and delivered on New York when it costs 85 points to make delivery, showing an obvious loss of $4.50 to $5 per bale in the transaction?

The March, 1925, option in New York ruled at shipping parity with southern spot values, because the stock in New York at that time was nil, normal parity temporarily prevailed, proving that large stocks in New York, containing large percentages of undesirable spinning character, viz, punky staple, do seriously depress prices and distort parities, while in other years even where stocks in New York have been relatively large, but the percentage of poor or undesirable staple and character small or negligible, these large stocks have not had a similar depressing effect, because lower rates of ocean freight and marine insurance from New York have tended to offset the increased toll or cost of delivery in New York against delivery in southern port.

January 12, 1928: Basis middling seven-eighths inch staple is bringing the price of March New York contracts f. o. b. interior Georgia-Alabama points to-day, and there is reported to be an active demand at this basis, especially for export to Germany. How does this basis compare with the price at which New York contracts basis middling can be received on contract and shipped, for example, c. i. f. and 6 per cent terms to Bremen:

Shipment from Georgia-Alabama interior points:
Cost f. o. b. interior, price of March New York, say	$0.1900
Inland freight from interior to southern port	.0055
Ocean freight to Bremen	.0060
Insurance, marine, etc	.0025
	.2040

Plus 6 per cent tare—94 divided by 20.40 equals 21.70 cents cost, insurance, freight, and 6 per cent. Bremen from Georgia-Alabama interior points.

Shipment from New York certificated stock:
Cost price of January New York contracts terms	$0.1900
Cost to place f. o. b. ship side	.0040
Ocean freight to Bremen	.0037
Insurance, marine, etc	.0018

Plus 6 per cent tare—94 divided by 19.65 equals 21.21 cents cost, insurance, freight, and 6 per cent. Bremen out of New York contract stock.

Showing a difference in favor of New York of some 49 points, or $2.50 per bale, yet the New York stock fails to move out except in very negligible quantities. Why? Because those engaged in manipulating the market have their interests best served by keeping the New York stock intact and a continuous weight on the value of the contract there until they have taken in their heavy short commitments, preferring to pay the higher prices ruling in the South to provide for their current spinners' requirements, and at the same time discouraging anyone else from receiving cotton on contract and shipping it out by delivering to any would-be receivers only the most undesirable character cotton in the stock, of which this year there is a very substantial percentage. This undesirable portion in the New York certificated stock this year, unhesitatingly and freely described by everyone who has had occasion to see it as punky staple, is the real keynote to the apparent paradox and enables the manipulators to keep the entire stock intact until they see fit to do otherwise, or until they have enjoyed the full benefit of the effect of its weight on prices and the relationship between spots and futures and between the New York market and other contract markets.

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 28, 1928.

Hon. MARVIN C. JONES,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: While we were in your office this week you asked us the question why cotton had declined from 25 cents to 18 cents. Others have asked me for an explanation of this seeming economic paradox of prices declining while the crop prospects were also declining.

I think the best way to make this clear to the lay mind is to explain that there has been in effect a grand auction sale conducted on the New York Cotton Exchange from day to day of quantities of cotton of poor, wasty staple, for which there was no demand. This stock of contract cotton in New York has been tendered and repeatedly tendered many times since September last, and this continued forced sale of this poor-character cotton in New York from day to day and from week to week and from month to month has been effected only at a constantly declining price level for the contract. Cotton growers in the South have held tenaciously to their spot cotton, only to see prices constantly lowered by this continued forced sale of poor-character cotton in New York, which has been shipped and held there expressly for that purpose by large manipulators.

If the cotton that is being tendered in New York was all of good character, this grand auction sale would have terminated before the 20-cent level was reached, as domestic mills and exporters would have taken up the cotton. As it is, the large stock of cotton is still there in New York, with no takers even at 17½ cents, which is the price to-day.

By allowing the cotton growers to find a market through delivery on contract for some 80,000 bales of poor-character cotton during the past season an opportunity has been offered and seized upon by large manipulators to destroy the whole price level for the balance of the crop and make an open mockery of the law of supply and demand. Growers of about 5 per cent of the cotton crop who demand an outlet through the contract market for their poor, wasty staple little realize the serious economic consequences that are visited on the growers of the other 95 per cent by admitting their undesirable cotton for delivery on contract.

It is for this reason that we propose to exclude cotton of poor character from delivery on contract in our bill.

Yours very truly,

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-eight Members present, a quorum.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10286, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the paragraph been read?

Mr. SPEAKS. I understood this was the first business in order this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask to return to page 42?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes. The agreement was that the first paragraph on page 42 should be passed and considered when we reached the item for rifle practice, page 64.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE STORES—AMMUNITION

For the development, manufacture, purchase, and maintenance of airplane bombs, pyrotechnics, grenades, ammunition for small arms, targets, and accessories for bomb, small arms, and machine-gun target practice; and ammunition for military salutes at Government establishments and institutions to which the issues of arms for salutes are authorized, $4,000,000.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to insure that the national matches, so called, and the School for Small Arms, which have been a part of the national-defense program for the past quarter of a century, shall continue annually as originally intended by existing law which has recently been restated and emphasized in a bill which passed the House January 16, 1928.

The national competition has been an outstanding military training event since 1903. For many years these meetings afforded the only opportunity for bringing the various organizations of our national-defense system into close association, and they are credited with being one of the most potent influences in establishing cordial relations between the Army and National Guard and in promoting the "all one army" movement.

Since 1903 the competitions have been held annually with the exception of 1912 and 1916, during the World War, until 1926, when the War Department original estimates failed to request the necessary appropriations. There appears to have been no reason for the omission and failure to provide for the annual events other than the arbitrary decision that they should not be held that year and that in future they should be scheduled biennially.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPEAKS. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make my statement out of order with respect to time, and I promise to be brief.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to that. That would grant the gentleman unlimited time.

Mr. SPEAKS. I shall agree to confine it to 15 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. From the beginning?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Beginning with the first five minutes?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKS. The amendment is based upon this particular item for the reason that the reduction could be made here without embarrassing the War Department or in any manner affecting the national welfare adversely or interferring with national-defense activities. Some 550,000,000 rounds of .30-caliber ammunition is now piled up in the reserve storehouses. This ammunition will remain there year after year deteriorating, and each year through deterioration millions of rounds will be declared unserviceable and sold to junk dealers or otherwise disposed of; so Members may understand that the 12,000,000 rounds which we might not purchase by reason of the $500,000 reduction is negligible in connection with the ammunition supply. The committee, on page 12 of their report, states in part as follows:

The committee has made careful inquiry into the foundation for published reports of an ammunition shortage. Much testimony has been taken and illuminating data supplied. * * *

* * * There is no plan prescribed by law. The plans are formulated by the War Department under the general statute imposing upon the General Staff the duty of preparing plans for national defense. The subject is one of constant study and there is a continuing fluctuation by reason of recurring studies of mobilization plans, changes in organization, and the development and supply of new weapons.

* * * The War Department plans to present to the Budget for the fiscal year 1930 a program looking to the gradual elimination over a period of years of the existing deficit and that will meet annual losses through deterioration. With the subject under study and unsolved when the pending estimates were being built, it would seem that this would be the orderly and logical course to pursue. Such recommendations as the War Department may submit must have the very careful consideration of all concerned.

The accompanying bill, in agreement with the Budget estimate, carries $7,393,034 for ammunition for all components. This compares with a sum less than $6,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to understand the parliamentary situation. The gentleman has simply offered an amendment now to reduce the amount in line 8, on page 42, as I understand it.

Mr. SPEAKS. That is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is all that is pending. Some of the Members, I think, do not understand the purpose of the gentleman, and I think it would be well enough to explain he proposes to reduce the amount here and increase the amount for rifle practice at another point in the bill.

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. My purpose was to first assure the House that there is absolutely no occasion to be alarmed regarding the ammunition supply, and it was my intention to quote the Secretary of War in support of this statement.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee says that the gentleman from Ohio is to follow this up with another amendment.

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes. A short time ago, Mr. Chairman, the press of the country carried a very alarming statement alleged to come from the War Department, the purport of which was that our supply of ammunition was not sufficient to last for a period of 30 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to be informed——

Mr. SPEAKS. I shall inform the gentleman if he will permit me to continue.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will tell me what is the object of this, I shall be very much indebted to him.

Mr. SPEAKS. This is an effort to secure funds for carrying on a part of our national training program without increasing the Budget. I want now to quote the Secretary of War relative to the ammunition supply, as shown on page 1015 of the hearings:

Mr. COLLINS. I want to ask the Secretary a question: Mr. Secretary, a very remarkable statement that was attributed to you was carried in the papers about six weeks ago, to the effect that we did not have enough ammunition to last us for 30 minutes.

Secretary DAVIS. I do not think that statement was attributed to me. I agree with you that it was a remarkable statement.

Mr. COLLINS. You disclaim responsibility for it?

Secretary DAVIS. I absolutely disclaim all responsibility for it. It was a foolish statement in the first place, and entirely untrue. It has been attributed to me in comments upon it, and I considered whether it was advisable to pay enough attention to it to even disclaim it. It purported to be a statement that I made to the President but which, of course, I did not make.

This should be sufficient to convince Members that, so far as the reduction in ammunition supply is concerned, if the amendment is adopted there is no occasion for apprehension in that connection.

My next amendment will be, on page 64, after the comma in line 9, insert a new paragraph, which conforms precisely to an amendment prepared by the War Department, to cover the national matches in 1926.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Is this for a national match or is it for rifle practice through the different States?

Mr. SPEAKS. This is in accordance with the plan of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, applying to all the States, and the national competition and school presents the final training stage. Practically every State is represented with teams; also from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, West Point, and Annapolis.

Mr. TABER. What the gentleman proposes is in respect to rifle matches and ordinary rifle practice as provided elsewhere?

Mr. SPEAKS. Competition and instruction; yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman state the total number of people who participate in the national events?

Mr. SPEAKS. There were about 101 teams at the last match.

Mr. McSWAIN. And the teams average how many?

Mr. SPEAKS. They number about 15.

Mr. McSWAIN. So that there were some 1,500 or 1,700 expert riflemen from all over the country at this last match?

Mr. SPEAKS. The teams came from all of the States. I have here telegrams from the adjutants general of practically all of the States, the National Guard associations of the United States, the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, the American Legion—all of the national-defense agencies of the Nation—supporting this proposition. It is not opposed by the War Department if we can secure the necessary funds outside of the items carried in this bill. The Secretary told me personally that he would not object if we would add to the present bill an appropriation to defray the expenses incurred.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. The adjutant general from Minnesota is in the city at this time. I have had quite a conference with him, and he is very much in favor of this and indorses it completely.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Are not these matches an incentive to a young man to take a greater interest in them, because the young men have the hope of being selected to represent their units at the national matches?

Mr. SPEAKS. Undoubtedly. The competitions in the States create an interest in rifle shooting that can be accomplished in no other way, and the enthusiasm reaches its culmination in this school and competition.

This program results in developing thousands of expert riflemen who are qualified to act as instructors to the millions of untrained civilians who would be called upon in times of emergency.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Why does not the gentleman make an addition to the sum given here for these matches? It is a very good thing. I object to taking this money away from the fund for ammunition. Last year the Secretary of War came before our committee and gave us a very alarming account of the state of our ammunition.

Mr. SPEAKS. I have just read you a statement from the Secretary of War wherein he discounts all such reports and condemns them in the strongest terms. The reason why we are asking for a reduction is to avoid increasing the total amount the bill carries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very much in favor of the gentleman's amendment to strike $500,000 from this item and also to that which is to follow, providing $500,000 for these national rifle matches.

Former President Roosevelt said that "A man who can not shoot straight might as well be armed with a club." When we look at this vast appropriation of $399,000,000, of which some $300,000,000 goes for war purposes, we must see that it is absolutely essential in order to expend that money properly and advantageously that our men should be able to shoot straight. The apex of this whole appropriation is the fact that we want to reach the enemy, and if men can not shoot straight they will never reach the enemy, and the ammunition and the great aggregation back of it is all wasted.

Among the men of great ability and of vast influence in our Army warfare is Major General Lejeune, who says:

* * * We put a team in the first annual match, and from that day until the present time there has been an increasing interest in rifle shooting, and rifle shooting in the Marine Corps dates from the beginning of the national rifle matches. Our whole system of training is built up so that the annual rifle match is the apex of the pyramid. * * *

This rifle-shooting program is an annual program and, as I have stated, the national match in September of each year is the incentive and the goal toward which all these men are working.

It would be, in my opinion, a calamity to discontinue these matches; that is, to discontinue holding them each year. The interest would lapse undoubtedly, and the impetus would certainly die out. * * *

The thing that differentiated the American from the foreign soldiers was the ability of the American soldiers to shoot straight and hit an individual instead of just shooting at the landscape. Our men fired at marks, at other men; they fired as individual men, and they did not waste so much ammunition, and they hit what they shot at; just as in the old days rifle shooting was kept up in this country by the woodsmen and the hunters and pioneers, who had to shoot in order to live.

This is followed by the statement of Gen. R. H. Allen, Chief of Infantry, who indorses these matches, and says:

The "national match" is really a misnomer. It is really the national school of musketry. * * *

If we will look at the history of our country and our military operations, we will find that our success since the days of the Indian wars has been largely or primarily due to our ability as rifle shots. * * *

That national asset, marksmanship, which was built up in the early days from the fact that a man shot for his meals and shot to live, is becoming lost, and it is dying out, and unless something is done to foster and keep alive interest in rifle shooting, and to grant the facilities for the citizen to use the rifle and to become enthusiastic in its use, we will not only lose our standing as the leading nation in the world in marksmanship, but with it we are going to lose something that is far more vital to us as a nation; when called into the service, if we ever should be, we are going to lack the aggressiveness and the offensive spirit that were the great features of our success in the past. Therefore I consider that a movement is necessary that will foster rifle shooting that will stir up enthusiasm among the civilians, not in the Army. It is a fine thing for the Army, of course, and it adds an incentive, but if it was simply for the Army that it was wanted, if it was simply the Infantry of the Army that wanted it, I would not be for it.

It is for the civilian public, in the reserve, and the civilian rifle teams, instruction of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and of the citizens military training camps and the civilian rifle clubs.

Colonel Macnab, who is deeply interested and who recommends it strongly, says:

Our present arms and ammunition are due to our present training methods which are due to the national matches. If we give up these matches, 10 years from now we may not have the rifle and the ammunition and the training methods that we ought to have 10 years from now. We do not know. If we had not had these rifle matches in the past we would not have to-day the present rifle and ammunition, and if we give up the matches now we may not have what we ought to have 10 years from now. That is the point on the ammunition and the rifle. There is no doubt about that being correct. I think even the Ordnance Department will admit that. * * *

There are 2,000 rifle clubs alone that are associated with the National Rifle Association, containing a great many more than 100,000 members. All of those men influence their clubs. They are influencing others at home. If the national matches were not held every year, in my opinion these clubs would be reduced greatly in numbers, and the ones that were left would be reduced greatly in efficiency, because the incentive that keeps them going, of these national matches, of going to the matches, the members of each one of these clubs, more than one member from some of them going to those matches, they go back enthused, they have new ideals, they carry the enthusiasm back.

* * * If we stop, if we have this interruption of a whole year without any matches, I do not believe the saving would be commensurate with the harm done.

There are 101 rifle clubs in this country having a total membership of 100,000 members. They are all in favor of this. Some 1,500 of them participate. I think we ought certainly to have the appropriation for this purpose.

I have a letter from Gen. M. A. Reckord, the executive vice president of the National Rifle Association of America, in which he gives me the information that 101 teams participated in the last national matches consisting of—Service, 5; National Guard, 47; Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 9; citizens' military training camps, 9; making a very splendid array of these clubs. General Reckord is a soldier of great ability. He is renowned for his splendid record on the battle fields of France. He is a man of expert rifle practice and a wonderful executive officer. Knowing him and his record as well as I do, and his support of this amendment, there can be no doubt that it is meritorious, necessary, and of great benefit to our country and its national defense.

The Budget has left out entirely an appropriation for these matches, and yet they have asked additional appropriations for 1929 of $29,000,000, and all we are asking for is that $500,000 of that money be allocated to these national rifle matches. This is not a new proposition. It is not a proposition that has originated since the war. We find that these national matches have been going on for many years. I have the list of them here. The national rifle matches were first held in the year 1903 at Seagirt, N. J., and since that time they have been held every year with the exception of 1912; 1918, when the war was going on; and the year 1926. So that it is not a new proposition. The Government has recommended it ever since 1903, and it has not been until this time that a proper appropriation has not been made for this purpose.

I sincerely trust that you gentlemen will consider the point. The point we are making is that the contest in these rifle matches are bringing together numbers of men who take part in the matches and who become sharpshooters and men who can shoot straight. If there is one thing in the history of the recent war that stands out prominently, it is the fact that America abounds in men who can shoot straight and in men whom we call sharpshooters.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Does not the gentleman understand that in 1926 there was no appropriation for this and that these matches were not held?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I said they had been held every year, with the exception of 1912, 1918, and 1926, since the year 1903. So it is no new institution. It is something that has been recognized by the Government all these years for some 24 or 25 years. I certainly trust you will give this matter your very serious consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is not making any new appropriation. It is merely allocating $500,000 for this purpose, which has been done ever since 1903. It is taking practically nothing from the general appropriation, because the general appropriation has been increased $29,000,000; and all we are asking of that is the allocation of $500,000 for what we consider a very vital practice in the military affairs of our country. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. A large standing army is not compatible with our form of government; the people do not want it; Congress does not want it. Therefore when we, as a nation, are forced to back up our rights with something more than words, it is a great citizen army that we must depend upon. For that reason I want to state right here that I am for anything that will increase the efficiency of that citizen army. I believe that every effort made and every dollar spent—whether it be for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, or expert rifle shooting—toward the training of that great citizen army is effort and money well and wisely invested. Because it is this great citizen army that is, after all, our real line of defense, and because it is these boys and men off the street, out of the shop, out of the office—yes, even out of our schools—who must bear the brunt of war when it comes, it is only fair that they should have this break that the opportunity to gain even a superficial knowledge of military tactics and science gives them. During the late war a large majority of the casualties occurred among young men between the ages of 19 and 21 years. I recall having heard an Army officer recount his experience in sending untrained men—mere boys—out to locate machine-gun nests. Instead of prostrating themselves on the ground and crawling along, they rushed forward, literally on tiptoes, into the very jaws of death. Sheer lack of knowledge as to how to protect themselves was not the least of the reasons for our heavy casualties.

I find in the Republican platform of 1924 these words:

> There must be no further weakening of our Regular Army. We advocate appropriations sufficient to provide for the training of all members of the National Guard, the citizens' military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, Officers' Reserve Corps, and the reserves who may offer themselves for service.

So that we Republicans are doubly bound in this matter.

Mr. Brisbane, in his article in this morning's Washington Herald, had this to say:

> Our State Department has signed an arbitration treaty with France. The treaty recognizes the Monroe doctrine, which is satisfactory. But best and only permanent recognition of that doctrine will be found in adequate defense and preparation.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks by adding resolutions passed by 30 women's patriotic organzations of America at a conference called by the Daughters of the American Revolution and held in Washington last week.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

> Whereas reliance by the American people upon the national defense act as a safe defense policy is justified only so far as that policy is carried into effect; and
> Whereas the Chief of Staff of the United States Army estimates that 220,000 reserve officers are needed to function the six field Army mobilization plan of the War Department; and
> Whereas at this time there are but about 110,000 reserve officers; and
> Whereas there are only about 16,000 of these reserve officers trained annually: Therefore be it.
> Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense indorse the plan contemplated by the national defense act of having trained in peace time a sufficient number of reserve officers to train and command a draft Army on the basis of the War Department's present mobilization plans of six field armies in the event of national emergency.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my distinguished colleague from California that I quite agree with her that young men 18 and 19 years of age, who may be called upon to handle a rifle in case of war, should be properly trained, but those young men 18 and 19 years old are not going to receive any benefit from this amendment. This amendment is for the national rifle matches, and let us see just what the exact situation is.

We carry in this bill for civilian rifle clubs $200,000, which is $100,000 more than we carried in the 1928 bill. In other words, we appropriate twice as much in this bill for the civilian rifle clubs as we did for the fiscal year 1928. There are in this country 1,560 civilian rifle clubs with a total membership of about 100,000. We provide twice as much money for their training as we did during the present fiscal year. The only difference is that we make no provision for the national matches at Camp Perry, Ohio. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio proposes to take $500,000 out of the appropriation for ordnance stores and ammunition. That appropriation of $4,000,000 is broken down into 38 different projects; that is, the $4,000,000 will be spent for 38 projects, most of it for ammunition. The largest project under this item is for the procurement of .30-caliber ball ammunition, for which the estimated expenditure is more than $3,000,000. If you take $500,000 out of the $4,000,000 you are going to wreck this set-up for the item of ordnance stores and ammunition.

What are we doing for civilian rifle practice in this country? We are all in favor of civilian rifle practice. The committee is in favor of it and brings in a bill every year with an item in it for civilian rifle training. As I said a moment ago, we have doubled the appropriation this year.

To all of these 1,560 clubs, which have a total membership of about 100,000, the United States Government furnishes free of cost two .30-caliber rifles and two .22-caliber rifles. In addition to that we have a number of school teams throughout the country that engage in rifle practice, and to these school teams the Government furnishes, free of cost and without expense to the schools, up to 100 rifles per team.

We propose to furnish these civilian rifle clubs for home training, which is the real training, 120 rounds of .30-caliber ammunition per man firing—that is, if a man is just an honorary member of a club and is not interested in firing, he will not get any ammunition—but for every man firing the Government furnishes free of charge 120 rounds of .30-caliber ammunition and 200 rounds of .22-caliber ammunition. In addition to that we furnish targets and other supplies for them to carry on this rifle practice. This is all going to be done under this bill to an extent twice as great as they are doing it this year.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the organic act upon which this appropriation is based provide for an annual rifle match?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; if I remember the language correctly, it states that there shall be annual estimates submitted of the cost of rifle practice.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I imagined it was not clear, to say the least of it, in view of the fact that the House at this session has passed a bill providing specifically for such matches to be held annually.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman that the language of the act does not definitely declare that these national matches shall be held every year.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does this $100,000 extra which the gentleman speaks of for target practice contemplate an annual match?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; that is for the home training of the members of these clubs.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Then the War Department in the absence of this amendment does not contemplate the holding of these matches annually in the future?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to procede for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is now contemplated to hold these national matches biennially instead of annually, and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] will provide for the matches being held annually; that is, it will provide for national matches in 1928. We held one in 1927 and the bill proposes to pass 1928.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina, if I have the time.

Mr. McSWAIN. It is the program of the War Department to hold the national match every other year?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is the program of the War Department.

Mr. McSWAIN. But if the bill which this House has already passed passes the Senate and is signed by the President it will be compulsory to hold it every year.

Mr. BARBOUR. That would be a different proposition, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. The House has already passed that bill.

Mr. SPEAKS and Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPEAKS. I just want to develop the facts. The fact that the House had passed the bill H. R. 8550, which made it absolutely compulsory that these matches be held annually, was brought to the attention of the gentleman's committee before the committee report was made, was it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SPEAKS. And the fact that this House again expressed itself after the Judge Advocate General of the Army had held it was compulsory to hold these matches annually, but nevertheless the committee disregarded that.

Mr. BARBOUR. The bill had not passed the Senate and there was nothing for the committee to disregard.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The present law provides that the War Department shall submit estimates for these matches, does it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. Shall submit estimates for rifle practice.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But the gentleman thinks that through a technicality the law does not direct the committee to do it and it can be evaded.

Mr. BARBOUR. Not by any technicality, but under the plain language of the law. Read the law and the gentleman will see what the provision is.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is what I have done, and I would imagine from reading it that when the law states they shall submit annual estimates for these matches it was the intention that we should have these rifle matches annually.

Mr. BARBOUR. Not necessarily. It depends entirely on how it may be adapted to the program of the War Department. If I may continue with my statement, I will show just how this fits in with the War Department's program.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What would be the use of submitting the estimates if we were not to have the appropriations?

Mr. CLAGUE. May I explain that just a moment? I think the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is mistaken about there being anything in the law with respect to estimates.

Mr. BARBOUR. My recollection is that the law refers to estimates. The gentleman from Minnesota has the law before him, and I will ask him to read just what the law says.

Mr. SPEAKS. While the gentleman is looking for that, will the gentleman from California permit a suggestion?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. In view of the fact that I shall offer an amendment which will bring that question immediately before the Speaker, I suggest we just pass it over now.

Mr. BARBOUR. The amendment which has been offered opens up the whole subject.

Mr. SPEAKS. There is no question about the pending amendment being in order, but the next amendment to be offered will bring out the question of whether these national matches are authorized by law.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I did not bring up that question at this time. It was brought up by questions that were asked.

Mr. CLAGUE. May I read just what the law is?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. CLAGUE. The law is this:

The Secretary of War shall annually submit to Congress recommendations and estimates for the establishment and maintenance of indoor and outdoor rifle ranges, under such comprehensive plan as will ultimately result in providing adequate facilities for rifle practice in all sections of the country.

Mr. BARBOUR. Those are the estimates that I had in mind.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is stronger than I thought it was.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman read that part on the other page where his thumb is?

Mr. CLAGUE. That relates to the trophies.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; at the annual matches.

Mr. BARBOUR. Let me go on with my statement. We are not getting anywhere by having this discussion of the law.

In order to have these national matches this year it is going to cost in the neighborhood of $578,000.

Mr. SPEAKS. How much was the estimate for last year?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not recall definitely.

Mr. SPEAKS. Four hundred and seventy thousand dollars, as I recall.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not those figures before me, but it is going to cost this year in the neighborhood of $578,000.

In addition to this, there will be the cost of the Army and the Navy teams that will go to the national matches. This year we had 101 teams at the national matches and they averaged 13 men each. So it will cost in the neighborhood of $600,000 to send about 1,300 men to these national matches.

They get their expenses paid from wherever they live. The match last year lasted 29 days at Camp Perry, and they received 5 cents a mile going and coming. They also received $1.20 a day subsistence, and tents, equipment, rifle, ammunition, and all of those things for the period of 29 days.

It is proposed to hold the national matches every two years instead of yearly. It was testified before our committee that the cost of the matches is mounting up each year. There is a larger attendance of contestants each year. They are increasing the number of matches each year, all piling up the cost of the national matches.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he considers that this deduction of $500,000 from the proposed appropriation for ammunition supply is really a serious matter?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do. We are told that our ammunition supply is being depleted. It is not nearly as bad as has been pictured, but if we keep taking away from appropriations for ammunition the supply will be depleted.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Personally, I would rather have the proposition to increase the appropriation for rifle matches rather than intrench on this provision for ammunition.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. If this amendment is defeated, will the gentleman from California oppose an amendment to add $500,000?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will. I do not think it is justified under the War Department program.

The Secretary of War was asked about the national matches when he appeared before the committee, and this is what he said:

Mr. BARBOUR. What would you say about the department's attitude toward having the national rifle matches held every year instead of every other year?

Secretary DAVIS. From my association with it as Assistant Secretary of War, when I was directly in charge of it, I think that the national rifle matches are a very valuable asset. There is a tremendous amount of interest in it among men who participate in it, and they give a benefit beyond the actual number who participate in the matches. They extend the interest all over the country all the rest of the year. On the other hand, it is quite an expensive element of the military problem. I have not looked at the figures for a year or so, but my recollection is that it would cost, certainly, $500,000, and perhaps more than that, or between $500,000 and $600,000, to hold the matches. I was rather appalled when I got the figures together originally, when they were compiled from the different appropriations. In addition to that, it takes quite a number of men from other duties to operate the butts, to take care of the camps, and that sort of thing. It is a very arduous duty, and a duty of a kind that enlisted men naturally do not like to perform. In one sense of the word, it is really not the sort of duty that they came into the Army to perform; so it does have that effect. It is rather unfair to any one command to give them that job year after year. All of those things, of course, must be taken into consideration. We felt that while the rifle practice was a very valuable asset, it was a rather expensive proposition and that it would be fair to work out a plan by which those matches would be held every other year. I am inclined to think that is a sound decision.

Now bear in mind that we are not decreasing the amount for civilian rifle practice; we are doubling it. It is only the experts who go to the national matches—1,300 to 1,500 of them, who are asking for this additional $500,000 or $600,000.

To throw further light on the position of the Secretary of War in regard to this proposal I am going to ask the Clerk in my time to read certain sections of a letter dated January 25, addressed by the Secretary of War to the Hon. DAVID A. REED, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate, expressing his opinion on the bill that passed the House of Representatives a short time ago, which would require these matches to be held annually and which has been referred to in this discussion.

The Clerk read as follows:

I do not favor the passage of the act for the following reasons:

The law should not be such that the War Department will be required to hold the national matches annually, irrespective of important considerations, which would make it unprofitable from the point of view of national defense to hold these matches every year. Under existing conditions the question of how often the national matches should be held may be discussed under three major considerations, i. e., financial, personnel, and training.

FINANCIAL CONSIDERATIONS

The approximate cost, chargeable to War Department, appropriations, of holding the national matches is $570,000.

Under present conditions it is not believed that this amount should be spent for national matches oftener than on alternate years. There are many projects of the War Department for which more money is desired. To these projects favorable consideration can not always be given on account of limited appropriations. Such matters as better housing conditions, maintenance of authorized enlisted strength, better uniforms, increase of war reserves, increase in ammunition allowances, active-duty training of more reserve officers, increasing the number of citizens' military training camps trainees, increasing the number of Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, larger-scale maneuvers, more joint Army and Navy exercises, and many other projects, including the national matches, must be carefully considered in formulating the War Department estimates and decision as to how much should be spent on each after the limiting figure of the War Department is set.

The amounts to cover the holding of the national matches this calendar year are not included in the Budget for the fiscal year 1929. The expense of these matches could not be borne by other items included in the 1929 Budget without seriously interfering with the activities covered by these items.

PERSONNEL CONSIDERATIONS

The personnel, exclusive of competitors, required for conduct of the national matches and the school of instruction consists of about 300 officers and 1,800 enlisted men. The Marine Corps has usually furnished about 250 enlisted men and some officers, but in 1927 was unable to do this.

In order to limit the cost the Regular Army personnel has to be taken from stations in the Great Lakes—Ohio Valley region. Climatic conditions in these localities demand that the fullest use be made of the period of favorable weather for troop training. To take troops away from their training work in this season works a distinct hardship on these troops and limits their value in connection with the military training of civilians, one of the most important tasks imposed upon the Regular Army. If this task is to be properly accomplished the Regular Army must itself be well trained, and consequently advantage must be taken of favorable seasons.

To hold these matches annually would unduly deprive the troops of the Regular Army from their self-training and hamper to a considerable extent their work in connection with the civilian components.

TRAINING CONSIDERATIONS

Small-arms marksmanship is a very important element in the training of officers and men belonging to branches having such weapons. Its importance is so great that the War Department can not make its efficiency and development dependent on the national matches any more than the development of horsemanship can be made dependent on the national horse show. Therefore small-arms marksmanship is an important part of the training in the special-service schools and generally throughout the Regular Army and National Guard. It is also emphasized in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps and citizens' military training camps. The War Department, through the director of civilian marksmanship, assists civilian rifle clubs throughout the country with arms, ammunition, and equipment. Experiments by the Ordnance Department and the various using branches are continually being made to improve weapons and ammunition and develop increased efficiency in their use. The following are the appropriate amounts carried in War Department appropriations to provide small-arms ammunition to be used annually by the various activities indicated:

Regular Army	$2,100,000
Organized Reserves	100,000
Citizens' military training camps	122,000
National Guard	910,000
Reserve Officers' Training Corps	157,000
Civilian rifle clubs	150,000

In addition to the amounts just mentioned, there are carried in annual War Department appropriations items to cover manufacture and repair of small arms, maintenance and repair of rifle ranges and target equipment, and other things connected with instruction in small-arms marksmanship of the military and nonmilitary organizations listed above. Also additional compensation is allowed for qualification in the principal arms of the various units of the Regular Army. Thus it is seen that Congress appropriates for, and the War Department provides for continual training and interest in marksmanship in the Army and generally throughout the country. Although the national matches were not held in 1926, those held in 1927 had greater attendance, the interest displayed was unusually keen, and the scores were generally higher than had obtained in previous national matches.

The War Department recognizes the value of the national matches, and the small-arms firing school held in connection therewith as means of further disseminating instruction in marksmanship and of creating interest. The gathering together of the best shots from all sources in competition is highly desirable and beneficial. But considering the present financial, personnel, and training conditions, and carefully weighing the value of the national matches in comparison with other activities the conclusion is that the national matches should be held on alternate years. Therefore the passage of any legislation making it obligatory to hold the matches annually is not favored.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask the House to bear in mind that we are continuing this rifle practice, and are spending large sums for the National Guard, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' military training camp. We propose to spend $200,000 in 1929 for civilian rifle clubs, as compared with $100,000 in 1928. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being spent for rifle training, and such training is not affected by this amendment. The only thing this amendment does is to send about 1,500 expert rifle shots from all parts of the country to Camp Perry for about a month to engage in competition. The fact that the matches in 1927, after they had passed 1926, were the best ever held is an indication that no harm has been done, and that no interest has been lost in the matches.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. This amendment decreases the amount available for producing ammunition. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion as to the amount of ammunition now on hand. There is reference in the hearings to a newspaper report to the effect that we are deficient, and something was read from the statement of the Secretary of War. But he does not deny the truthfulness of that newspaper statement. He says that it was wrong to publish it, as far as it was read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS].

Mr. BARBOUR. The committee, I think, denied the truthfulness of the statement in its report, and in the statement that was made on the floor previous to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of appropriations for the activities of the Military Establishment, agree with the logic set forth in the letter just read, that a man would be a better marksman if he practices only once in two years?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not think that was said. This does not refer to his practice. We are providing amply for practice. This is taking him to Camp Perry for a national match, to compete with other men from other sections of the country.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman think he would be a better shot in a national contest by having him meet in matches only once in two years than if he were to meet every year?

Mr. BARBOUR. The evidence before our committee shows that the matches held in 1927, after passing 1926 without holding matches, were the best matches that have been held. I was not there. I am taking the testimony of the men who were there.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Why does not the gentleman, following that logic, recommend that we have these matches quadrennially? They might be still better then.

Mr. BARBOUR. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas ask that of the men who attended the matches last year and who appeared before the committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for time to read an amendment approved last year, on February 14, 1927, in reference to these rifle matches.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, on February 14, 1927, the following amendment was approved:

That for the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, members of rifle clubs, and civilians, and for the cost of trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, and for the promotion of rifle practice throughout the United States, including the reimbursement of necessary expenses of members of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice to be expended for the purpose hereinbefore prescribed, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the sum of $7,500 is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually: Provided, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per day, and when meals are furnished no greater expenses than that sum per man per day for the period the contest is in progress.

That was the expression of the Congress on February, 1927. The Congress specifically said for the annual contest of rifle clubs.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] provides for a reduction in the number of .30-caliber cartridges that can be made under this appropriation so that when we get through the year, instead of having an increased shortage of 13,000,000, we will have an increased shortage of 25,000,000 rounds. We have 560,000,000 rounds, or about that much, but we have a great big loss every year due to deterioration, and we have to begin to put some new cartridges into our reserve or we will find a little further along that we will not have any that are up to date and any good.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. What is the capacity of the Frankfort Arsenal in producing .30-caliber ammunition on an eight-hour basis?

Mr. TABER. I can not give the gentleman that offhand. Can he give it?

Mr. SPEAKS. It is about 60,000,000 rounds annually, as I recall. That is 5,000,000 rounds a month on an eight-hour basis. Add to this the peace-time capacity of the Winchester, the Great Western, the Remington, the Peters, and others, we would have several hundred million rounds; so that so far as ammunition is concerned the amount eliminated by this amendment is absolutely negligible.

Mr. TABER. That is what I want the committee to have in mind. Our capacity for producing cartridges all together in this country is only 120,000,000 rounds, and that is not enough. That is not enough. We could not go into production in any kind of shape at any reasonable time on these cartridges to supply the deficiency. That is exactly the situation.

Mr. SPEAKS. Does the gentleman say that deterioration and requirements of the Army annually could not be met with the Frankfort Arsenal alone?

Mr. TABER. No. I meant to say that if we got into an emergency with only 120,000,000 rounds capacity in the United States, you are up against it, and our depreciation is going on at such a rate that our 560,000,000 rounds is fading away at the rate of more than 25,000,000 rounds a year, and when it gets a little older we will not have any reserve.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Not at this time.

That is the situation with reference to the ammunition reserve, and that is the reserve which the country depends upon at this time. This $500,000 ought not to be taken out of this appropriation.

Now I want to talk a little bit about these rifle matches, so that the committee will have in mind a clear idea of just what these rifle matches are. These rifle matches were attended last year by 101 teams. I do not know just how many men, but about 15 men on a team, perhaps 14; perhaps 13. That means about 1,500 men, and those men stayed there the whole 30 days. They not only had rifle competition but they had instruction. It was a good school, and it was a successful school; and it was the more successful because it was possible to get a lot of these people on the guard teams and on the reserve teams to be there, because they can not possibly stand the strain of going every year.

Now, on top of that there were 34 civilian rifle clubs who were there to compete, and a great many members of these civilian teams are said to be between 60 and 70 years of age and absolutely unfit to serve in cases of emergency.

Now, another thing. The cost of this thing is very high, because before they get to these matches they have a competition to see what company and what arsenal can put up the best bullets.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. NEWTON in the chair). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TABER. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. They have competition annually in their districts and in the Army and in the guard for marksmanship. The fact that we do not pass this addition to the bill and put in these rifle matches does not mean any curtailment of practice, because we have provided a great deal more for that purpose than was given last year. I submit that all together, taking the whole situation together, we should not touch this ordnance appropriation, and we would not under the circumstances have need of rifle matches next year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman expressed himself as in doubt.

Mr. SPEAKS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 59.

Mr. SPEAKS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. Those who favor taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] A sufficient number have arisen.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. SPEAKS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Ohio if the section to which he offers this amendment is a new section, the amendment to be offered on line 9, on page 64?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SPEAKS: On page 64, after the comma, in line 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the conduct of the national matches and the maintenance and operation of the Small Arms Firing School held in conjunction therewith as authorized by section 113 (c) of the national defense act (act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 7, 1924, and February 14, 1927), including procurement and installation of equipment, ammunition, supplies, materials, flooring and frames for tents, construction of shooting galleries, and shelters for rifle practice; nonstructural improvements; repairs and alterations to buildings, water system, sewer and lighting systems; repairs and alterations to equipment and supplies; communication service; pay and allowance of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard participating in the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School from the date of departure from their homes to the date of return thereto; pay and allowance of reserve officers called to active duty in connection with the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School; personal and nonpersonal services; subsistence, including commutation of rations, to authorized teams from the National Guard, Organized Reserve, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and civilian teams representing the States and including the enlisted men of teams from the Regular Army from the date of departure from their homes or stations to the date of return thereto at the rate of not exceeding $1.50 per day each; transportation, including repair, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled and animal-drawn vehicles; travel of authorized teams representing the Regular Army, National Guard, Organized Reserve, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and civilian teams representing States, including officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; travel of commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Regular Army; National Guard, and Organized Reserve on duty in connection with the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School, including mileage of officers; reimbursement of travel expenses or allowances in lieu thereof as authorized by law for officers of the Regular Army and Organized Reserve; travel of civilian employees to and from the national matches, including a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence while traveling to and from said matches and while on duty thereat; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $500,000."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio on the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to be heard also.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to make an argument, and will simply refer you to section 113 of the national defense act, particularly paragraph (c), and also to a decision rendered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] while in the chair on March 28, 1924, wherein he held that the law was sufficient even to authorize expenditures for international matches, not merely national matches in the United States but international matches also.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] just what specific portions of this amendment he deems to be without the provisions of section 181 of the National Code of Laws?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all of the amendment as it was read, but I hold it in my hand and will read this language:

pay and allowance of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard participating in the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School from the date of departure from their homes to the date of return thereto; pay and allowance of reserve officers called to active duty in connection with the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School; personal and nonpersonal services.

I do not know of any law, Mr. Chairman, which authorizes an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. SPEAKS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will.

Mr. SPEAKS. That language—I admit there is a good deal of it—is the exact language set up by the War Department upon the advice of the General Staff and, as I have been informed, approved by the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and is an exact copy of an amendment suggested in a supplementary estimate prepared for the 1926 matches.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the chairman of the subcommittee has admitted that he knows of no law which this violates; so why argue the question?

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. If the Chair will refer to section 113 of the national defense act, he will find there a direction, first, to the Secretary of War to make estimates for these rifle matches annually. In two other places also there is an authorization for the appropriation of money to buy the trophies; that is, the loving cup given to the winning team. Now, Mr. Chairman, while it is true that the law as it now stands is not mandatory and does not require an annual match, it is permissive and authorized, and there is just as much authority, I respectfully submit to the Chair, to hold the match annually as there is to hold one every other year or every third year.

Suppose that in 1929 we were making appropriations for 1930 and the gentleman came in with his estimate for this match, and which he now says the War Department will bring in next year. Would there be any authority for it? If there would be any authority, the authority would be section 133 of the national defense act. It is an authorization and it is a permission of law. While it is not compulsory, while it is not mandatory, while it is not required, and while it is not the duty of the committee to do it, if the committee does not do it, it is within the power of this House to do it, because there is the same authority for the annual match as there is for the biennial match, the triennial match, or the quadrennial match. The same authority is absolutely contained in section 113 of the national defense act. I do not know whether the Chair has that section before him.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. NEWTON). The Chair has the act before him. It is chapter 12 of title 32 of the United States Code. The Chair is ready to rule. Of course, the opinion of the Chair goes to the question of the point of order and not to the merits of the question. After examining section 181 of title 32 of the United States Code the Chair is impressed with the very broad language of the act. For example:

The Secretary of War shall, within the limits of appropriations made from time to time by Congress, and in accordance with reasonable rules and regulations approved by him upon the recommendation of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, authorize and provide for—

And the Chair calls attention to the further very general and sweeping language of the authorization act—

(a) Construction equipment, maintenance, and operation of indoor and outdoor rifle ranges and their accessories and appliances.

(b) Instruction of able-bodied citizens of the United States in marksmanship and, in connection therewith, the employment of necessary instructors.

(c) Promotion of practice in the use of rifled arms, the maintenance and management of matches or competitions in the use of such arms, and the issuance in connection therewith of the necessary arms, ammunition, targets, and other necessary supplies and appliances, and the award to competitors of trophies, prizes, badges, and other insignia.

It is not necessary for the Chair to read the other provisions of the act. What has been read will give a very good idea of the very general and broad language used in the authorization act.

The Chair's attention has been called to an opinion rendered in construing the same act by Chairman TILSON, March 28, 1924. A similar point of order had been raised in reference to appropriations for international rifle matches. He said:

There is nothing in the amendment relating to international rifle matches. Section 113 of the national defense act is a provision entitled "Encouragement of rifle practice." And under that heading the act, as it seems to the Chair, attempts to authorize the holding of matches, the establishment and maintenance of indoor and outdoor rifle ranges, and authorizes the Secretary of War to prepare comprehensive plans such as will ultimately result in providing adequate facilities for rifle practice in all sections of the country and, in general, to secure, maintain, and carry on these rifle ranges and indoor targets for the purpose of encouraging rifle practice.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] calls special attention to the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice. It seems to the Chair that an act of this kind ought to be liberally construed to carry out the evident intent of the law itself. If the Secretary of War decides to carry it out through the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, it would seem without evidence to the contrary that this would be a proper means for carrying out the provisions of the law. Believing that the provisions contained in the amendment do not go beyond the authorization of the law itself, if properly interpreted, the Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order.

The Chair is of the opinion that with the broad language of the basic law and with the benefit of the observations made by the distinguished chairman [Mr. TILSON] that the point of order should be overruled.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Finance Section of the War Department estimates the cost of holding a match at approximately $1,000,000. Of course, this includes the expense chargeable to both the Army and Navy.

There will be teams sent from the Regular Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the National Guard, the Reserve Officers Training Corps, the citizens' military training camp, and citizens' rifle clubs. Rifle practice is furnished to all in these organizations, including rifle clubs, now.

Congress appropriates ample money to provide target practice to the Army and its civilian organizations. The same is true for the Navy; the same is true in the Marine Corps; the same is true in the National Guard and all other branches, including the rifle clubs. Congress furnishes the civilian clubs with ample ammunition, and this is provided for in the bill now.

It is proposed here to hold an annual match of all organizations. Really the only people that will be benefited, if it really be a benefit, will be the 34 civilian teams of 13 men each, or 442 individuals. Some of them range in age between 60 and 70 years.

Just think about it, training men for war whose ages range between 60 and 70 and at an expenditure of a million dollars!

Mr. LINTHICUM. How can it cost a million dollars when the amount proposed is only $500,000?

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, that does not amount to half the costs. I have stated to you what will have to be provided in the bill. There will of necessity be a deficiency item provided later to cover all the expense. Practically $25,000 a year to train men between 60 and 70 years for warfare.

Why not provide money for the golf clubs of the country. Golf is just as essential to training a man between 60 and 70 years of age for warfare as is rifle practice. You know the Government could not use these men in warfare. Why train them—why this expense?

Why, gentlemen, it seems to me to be utter folly. I will tell you why it is in this bill. These rifle clubs are a fine lot of upstanding men, and they have an upstanding citizen of Maryland here on the ground, and they are paying him $7,200 a year to work for appropriations like this and to look out for their welfare. General Reckord is a fine man. I am not saying anything in criticism of him. He is doing his work well for his organization.

In addition to this amount the general draws a salary of $5,000 a year as adjutant general of the State of Maryland, so I am told. I am not saying anything in criticism of him. I think he more than earns his salary. If I were in his shoes, I would work just as hard as the general does. But, gentlemen, we do not want to give away a million dollars merely to train 34 civilian teams of 13 men each, or a total of 442 men—it is a waste of public money and it is our duty to look out for the welfare of all citizens of our country, to protect them from wasteful appropriations, of which this is one.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, if we are to follow the logic of the gentleman from Mississippi and his argument in regard to the age of these men engaged in rifle matches, then the committee has stultified itself in making any appropriation for this purpose at all, but should have recommended that this branch of the service be discontinued altogether. Men should not stand on the floor of the House and make fun of men who are engaged in target practice; they seem to forget the lesson that Switzerland taught the world.

They say that a long time ago the Emperor of Germany was on a friendly visit to Switzerland, and while talking with the President of Switzerland he said, "Mr. President, I understand you have quite a number of crack riflemen in your military establishment." "Yes," said the President of Switzerland, "we have 500,000 crack shots in the military reserves of Switzerland." "Why, Mr. President," said the Emperor, "I would like to review some of your troops." "To be sure," said the President, and the troops were reviewed. Then said the Emperor, "Mr. President, do I understand you to say that you have 500,000 such men as these?" "I do, sir," said the President. "Well, Mr. President," said the Emperor, "suppose I should come against you with a million men?" "In that event," said the President, "my men would have to shoot twice apiece." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I received the following letter from Maj. Gen. John A. Hulen, the commander of the National Guard of my State, on this subject, which I desire to put in the RECORD at this time:

HEADQUARTERS THIRTY-SIXTH DIVISION
TEXAS NATIONAL GUARD,
Houston, Tex., February 1, 1928.

Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN GARRETT: I have been informed that the military appropriations bill does not provide funds for national matches. May I urge that you use your best efforts to have this item added to the bill on the floor when it comes up for consideration.

In my opinion the national matches are largely responsible for the present high standard in both rifles and ammunition. These matches have created much interest and enthusiasm throughout the National Guard and have trained many excellent instructors for members of their respective units at home.

You no doubt will recall that General Pershing in issuing his directions from France for the training of our divisions stressed time and again small arms target practice, and it is now a matter of history how these boys of ours, well trained in this phase of their serious undertaking, shoved the Germans before them with their well-directed rifle fire.

May I again urge that you do all that you consistently can in support of this very necessary activity. In this recommendation I feel confident that all the officers, especially the higher ranking officers, of the Thirty-sixth Division join me.

With assurances of my highest personal regards, I remain,
Yours very sincerely,

JOHN A. HULEN,
Major General, Texas National Guard, Commanding.

Of course, I understand that, regardless of what our own judgment may be, we are not supposed to raise our voice against anything that the Committee on Appropriations brings in here. Somehow or other when a man gets on that powerful committee—and it does not make any difference whether he is from Mississippi, California, or Illinois—he immediately swells himself up, sticks out his chest, and refers to the appropriations of the United States Government as "our" money. [Laughter.] He says, "we" have done so-and-so; "we" have allowed so much deteriorated ammunition to be shot away by these men during the year; "we" have said to the National Guard, "You can do this or you can do that." Well, who the devil is "we"? [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives ought to do what it knows it ought to do. If you are going to have peace in the country you will have to have a trained civilian establishment, these reserve officers, and your National Guard. They are the men that the world will stand before and tremble when we have an emergency. We have the Regular Army, and the men in it are wonderful military men. They play their part well and have always done so in all our history, and of them we are justly proud, but it was the four and a half million stalwarts who were called from all over this country that put the fear of Almighty God into the heart of the Kaiser of Germany. [Applause.] I think this House ought not to hesitate a moment about voting this appropriation into this bill, and take out some of the others if you want to. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio for five minutes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me for a moment, I want to read two telegrams at this point. One from the adjutant general of Illinois says:

There is no question but the national matches should be held annually. We have our annual instruction in rifle practice, and the matches are necessary for advanced training. Members of teams representing Illinois are all bona fide members of the National Guard and available in all emergencies.

The adjutant general of the State of New York says:

I consider national matches of vital importance to marksmanship. They should be annual or not at all.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, after hearing the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], I can readily see why the Democratic Convention went to Houston. [Applause.]

I hope it is not presumptuous on my part to defend my good friend from Ohio, General SPEAKS. I feel that if there are some lobbyists here on behalf of this item he is not actuated by their ideas or their inspiration. He has in his heart the welfare of Ohio and the rest of the Nation, and is interested in bringing to the young men of our country proper training. I hope I am not betraying any confidence or speaking too personally when I say that I happened to be aide-de-camp of Major General Farnsworth in the World War. When the time came to leave him I said, "Do you feel that Infantry is a thing of the past in military operations?" He said, "So long as there is war on the face of the earth the individual man with an individual method of defense will be the backbone of every military operation."

So I say that we must give that individual man an opportunity to be well trained to defend himself with the means of defense that we give him, and that means up to this time is the rifle. It is unfair to ask men to defend you in time of emergency unless you give them an opportunity to be trained. The committee will say that they do have training, but I claim that that training will not give the efficiency necessary unless the men have an incentive to put their hearts and souls into the training. I know that you as Americans love fair competition, and the men when they enter this training know that if they do well they are going to have the supreme happiness of representing their unit in the great national match. With General SPEAKS, I feel that you should see these men training, for, as he says, they will come to be the bulwark of your country in time of emergency. I felt almost like a murderer when I had replacements come to me at midnight in France and ask me how to load their rifles before they took their places in the line.

I say to you frankly that it is not right of any government to ask a man to enter a conflict and not be taught the method of defense. I think it is almost requiring him to sacrifice his life needlessly. I hope that we can give our sanction to this amendment. I feel that instead of so much placarding and advertising on the streets, asking men to join the Army, if you will simply tell them that they are going to have a chance to compete with the fine young manhood of our country in open competition in marksmanship and in healthful sports, they will flock to the standard more readily than they will be lured to it by these great placards throughout the country. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. It is not often that I take the floor to speak on a bill unless it is one that I think is of special importance to the country. I happen to know that in the State of Illinois we have a hundred and forty of these rifle clubs that belong to the National Guard. They are the most energetic men we have in the State of Illinois for keeping up the National Guard. They are not old men 60 and 70 years of age, but they average from 30 to 40 years, and some even younger than that.

They are all fellows who are willing to give up their time to go to any of the encampments. They do not ask any particular amount of pay for it. They are willing to go out and parade when it is necessary, and they are willing to go forward when they are called upon to defend the State or the country. If it is the will of the Congress of the United States to uphold men of this character, who are willing to give their time and even their lives if necessary to go to the front to defend the country, then the country itself ought to be willing to give them opportunity of keeping their organizations together.

Anyone with good sense knows that the life of any organization of this character depends upon these men going into encampment and into practice. If you take that away from them, then you take the life out of their organization; and so far as I am concerned, regardless of what it takes out of the Treasury for upkeep of these organizations, I am for it. I am for it for three reasons: First, the country needs these organizations; second, you can not keep up the organizations without giving them the opportunity to go to practice; and, third, the time may come when you will call upon these men to defend the country, and I think it is the duty of this Congress to appropriate the necessary funds to give these men the opportunity of having rifle practice.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that these middle-aged men attend the matches is an inspiration to the younger men?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I do.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, most of the argument that is made here in behalf of this amendment is entirely beside the question. Nobody disagrees with the idea that we should train the National Guard, that we should train men in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the men who go to the Citizens' Military Training Corps camps, and those in the rifle clubs. We are all in favor of such training, and hundreds of thousands of dollars are carried annually in these bills for just that kind of training.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BARBOUR. Not now.

Those are all provided for in this bill. If we were not providing for this training, then we might favorably consider an amendment which would provide it; but this amendment does not provide for that kind of training. It means taking 1,300 or 1,500 of the most expert riflemen and sending them for 30 days to Camp Perry to participate in the national rifle matches. The bill contemplates holding the matches every other year; not to hold them in 1928, but in 1929; and when we say "we" on the committee we are not speaking of ourselves, but of the Members of this House whom we represent, and when we speak of "money," we are not speaking of our money, but the taxpayers' money; the money that is paid into the Treasury by your constituents back home. That is the money we are trying to conserve.

It is not a question of stopping rifle practice. It is already provided in the bill. It is a question of sending 1,300 or 1,500 men to Camp Perry to hold a match every year instead of every other year and at an expense of $600,000 in round figures. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman expressed himself as in doubt and suggested a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER SUPPLIES AND SERVICES FOR RIFLE RANGES FOR CIVILIAN INSTRUCTION

To establish and maintain indoor and outdoor rifle ranges for the use of all able-bodied males capable of bearing arms, under reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice and approved by the Secretary of War; for the employment of labor in connection with the establishment of outdoor and indoor rifle ranges, including labor in operating targets; for the employment of instructors; for clerical services, including not exceeding $20,000 in the District of Columbia; for badges and other insignia; for the transportation of employees, instructors, and civilians to engage in practice; for the purchase of materials, supplies, and services, and for expenses incidental to instruction of citizens of the United States in marksmanship, and their participation in national and international matches, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and to remain available until expended, $6,875.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GUYER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, at a time when agriculture and agricultural pursuits are in a depressed condition, a situation that has existed for a number of years, I want to speak briefly of a phase of agricultural development and enterprise that promises much as one of the efforts which is aiding powerfully in the recovery of many areas of our agricultural communities.

I do not make the claim that it will cure all the ills of agriculture or solve all the problems of the farmer, but merely direct attention to it as one of the minor divisions of the farming industry which is adding a ray of hope to a distressing condition of America's greatest industry, that of tilling the soil.

Having lived on a farm most of my life and all the time since the end of the World War, I know by experience and by contact with farmers how difficult it is to raise grain or stock at a profit.

I do not at this time desire to discuss the problems of agriculture in general but only briefly to refer to the dairy development in a part of Kansas which I have the honor to represent, and for the purpose of this brief address I will confine myself to the dairy development of one county in the district.

Bourbon may not sound exactly like a milk county; nevertheless, it is. It is situated about 100 miles south of Kansas City on the Missouri border and is a typical county of that part of Kansas. It has a limestone soil and a climate suitable for raising bluegrass, clover, and alfalfa, and all other feed for dairy cows, and it has made a remarkable record in developing a great industry in a very short time which has revolutionized the industry of agriculture in that county; and what is true of Bourbon County is true to a great extent of Allen and Linn Counties also.

Things were not going right on the farms and the people were discouraged, so a careful survey was made and the situation critically analyzed. It was found that corn, wheat, and oats were almost the exclusive crops raised; and these were subject to all the uncertainties of climate, excessive rain, and drouth, as well as the ravages of insects. It showed a soil losing its fertility, decreasing crop yields, depreciating farm values, and an increasing percentage of tenant farmers; and out of it all a low morale among the country people, a depression in agriculture, and a lack of prosperity in the business institutions that depend upon the farmer.

With the result of this survey before them a group of live business men, including progressive farmers, concluded that with over 400,000 acres of limestone land capable of producing the best bluegrass, clover, and alfalfa, and a system of hard-surfaced roads radiating from the county seat, which is Fort Scott, they could establish a dairy industry which would rehabilitate the farming industry and at the same time recreate the fertility of their soil and induce a rising production of unexcelled feed for dairy cows. For what preserves and fertilizes the soil more than bluegrass, clover, and alfalfa?

These enterprising men went to work in a systematic way creating public sentiment in a vigilant, persistent, and intelligent press, and in public meetings, for 365-day hard-surfaced roads; for good roads and the dairy industry go hand in hand. They used all sorts of propaganda on the subject of good roads and dairy farming, and the result was a convincing educational campaign.

The dairy experts of the agricultural college at Manhattan and the services of the Farm Bureau were enlisted. The railroads centering at Fort Scott, always alert for business, added their powerful organizations to spread the truth of the kingdom of the cow. Men who knew their subject lectured at the schoolhouses so that people got to thinking and talking about the cows. It became the proper subject of conversation in polite society, and people were talking about the "land of milk and ready money."

Nothing ever happens that does not first exist in somebody's mind. Then it spreads to the minds of others and soon it materializes. The psychology of the situation was intelligently formed, and then it became an accomplished fact.

In 1919 a special train from Bourbon County visited the great dairy districts of Iowa, Illinois, and Wisconsin, where a party of 162 persons saw at first hand the results of intensive methods of dairy farming where it had long been established and successfully carried on.

Out of this intelligently directed campaign has unfolded one of the finest romances of cooperation between the city man and his country neighbor that is on record anywhere, and it furnishes a good example for industry and agriculture to follow.

Bourbon County has solved that problem of cooperation and it has furnished one of the finest examples of creative and constructive thought and action that I know of in recent years. Its agriculturists, dairymen-farmers have made many blades of grass grow where but one grew before.

It has given to the people a steady cash income. It has constructed 150 miles of hard-surface roads, the largest number of miles of hard-surfaced roads of any county in Kansas. In 1918, 80 dairymen sold 8,000 pounds of milk daily at the Borden condensary at Fort Scott; in 1924, 900 dairymen sold 125,000 pounds, and it is still expanding. Nearly a million dollars annually is paid to the farmers for milk in both Bourbon and Allen Counties.

It has created a Holstein-Friesian company to promote the breeding of a high grade of cattle, and has proved that it pays to keep only the best cows of whatever breed. It has produced a yearly dairy show exhibiting dairy cattle, dairy equipment, and dairy products, with the usual educational features of such occasions. In October, 1927, the dairy show was the event of the year, at which two young ladies—Miss Maida McCartney, of Bourbon County, and Miss Emma Lou Martin, of Linn County—were chosen to make a trip to Washington as the guests of the Kansas dairy show. They are in Washington at the present time, chaperoned by Mrs. Guyer. They were honor guests at the Kansas Day banquet on January 30 at the Raleigh Hotel, where they delivered the message of the development of the dairy industry in Kansas.

Miss Martin, addressing the gathering, said:

First, I wish to tell you this wonderful trip to Washington is most delightful in every respect, and I know not how to express my grateful thanks for the honor and many courtesies shown me here. The dream of seeing the National Capital is one I could hardly expect to have fulfilled for me, and I desire that you know I truly appreciate it.

I represent the dairy industry in the district composed of Linn and Bourbon Counties, Kans. This district lies along the Kansas-Missouri border and its center is about 80 miles south of Kansas City, with which we are connected by three railroad systems and two Federal-aid highways.

The contour of our part of the State is rolling and in some places broken. Ours is the oldest settled portion of the State. There was an Indian trading post in Linn County as early as 1825, but the first substantial settlement was about 22 years later.

Our people are of long-established American stock. They came to Kansas at a time when strong character was needed. They stayed and wonderful developments have sprung from the raw prairies.

Since the welfare of our Nation depends largely upon the farm not only for raw products but for the boys and girls from whom good citizens are made, the young people are continually being given by their parents more and better opportunities to encourage them to stay on the farm.

Bluegrass grows naturally there and a great deal of our land is adapted to the raising of alfalfa and other dairy feeds, such as corn and other small grains. Our marketing facilities, diversified climate, and general character of our soil are favorable to the dairy industry.

Fort Scott, which is the largest city in our district, has a large condensary. We are urging an increase of dairy farming. Almost every farmer keeps a few cows and sells cream. One or more cream stations may be found in every town. We do not believe the danger to the dairy industry lies in overproduction but rather in the combination of the middlemen within the cities. We with other farmers must depend upon Congress to guarantee us open markets.

We request you to inquire into the natural resources of Kansas, and particularly those of our district, and urgently invite you to come to live with us, that together we may build a better citizenship and increase the opportunities of our country, of which we already are so justly proud.

In addressing this assembly of Kansans, Miss McCartney said:

It seems fine, when so far from Kansas, to see so many Kansans and to feel so much at home.

I come to Washington bringing with me from the Kansas Dairy Show a message of the development of the dairy industry. It is surely a very great honor and pleasure for me to be able to deliver this message to you this evening.

Kansas is a State of surprises: First, Kansas surprises you by becoming the greatest wheat-growing State. Then Kansas astonishes you with its wonderful alfalfa production. Now Kansas amazes you with the rapid development of the dairy industry.

The people of Kansas discovered that no branch of agriculture is so essential to human life, so conducive to excellent character, so productive of agricultural contentment and prosperity as dairying. The people of Kansas also discovered that Kansas, with its mild, healthful climate, with its fertile soil that grows in abundance bluegrass, alfalfa, and ensilage, was a favorable place to develop the dairy industry; so the people of Kansas hastened to secure a splendid dairy development.

You who are especially proud of our State will be glad to know that the dairy industry has grown so rapidly that now Kansas has become one of the leading States in dairy production. Additional condensaries, creameries, and cheese factories are rapidly being established in our State. Since the Kansas dairyman is enjoying prosperity, we are confident that our future dairy development will be even more rapid than that of the past. We expect that soon Kansas will not only lead in the production of wheat and alfalfa but also in the production of dairy products.

I know you are glad to hear of the rapid development of the dairy industry in Kansas and will be glad to carry this message to others.

I deeply appreciate the many courtesies being shown me, and when I return to Kansas I will tell our people of the great interest you are showing in the prosperity and advancement of our splendid State.

In this achievement Bourbon County had the powerful assistance of the chamber of commerce at Fort Scott and of the farm organizations, which deserve the thanks of all who believe in constructive, scientific methods of industry, whether it be manufacturing or farming.

I have briefly outlined what was accomplished by intelligent effort, touching only the high points to illustrate a fine example of progressive farming and creative and constructive enterprise, and also furnished an example of cooperation between the business man and his neighbor, the farmer, which industry and agriculture may well emulate, for neither can be permanently prosperous without the prosperity of both.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment or material purchased outside of the United States from funds appropriated in this act shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order against the section just read, including lines, 7, 8, and 9, page 66, as being legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, we concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Monument on Kill Devil Hill, Kitty Hawk, N. C.: To commence the work preliminary to the acquisition of a suitable site, surveys, preparation of designs, and all necessary expenses incident to the erection of a monument on Kill Devil Hill at Kitty Hawk, N. C., in commemoration of the first successful human attempt in all history at power-driven airplane flight, in accordance with the act entitled "An act providing for the erection of a monument on Kill Devil Hill at Kitty Hawk, N. C., commemorative of the first successful human attempt in history at power-driven airplane flight," approved March 2, 1927, $5,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR: On page 75, line 15, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY ADJACENT TO LOWELL CREEK, ALASKA

For every expenditure requisite for and incidental to the regulation of Lowell Creek, Alaska, as authorized by Public Resolution No. 52, approved February 9, 1927, to be available immediately, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended or obligated until the sum of $25,000 shall have been contributed by the town of Seward or other local interests to be benefited.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

ARMY REMOUNT SERVICE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bill under consideration contains an item appropriating money for the purchase of horses for the military service, not only for remounts for members of the military establishment entitled to public mounts but also for breeding purposes.

My able, diligent, and distinguished colleague [Mr. VINSON of Kentucky] has introduced a bill (H. R. 7195) to authorize an annual appropriation for those purposes. Mr. VINSON'S bill, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am a member, passed the House without a dissenting vote, and I hope it will meet with a similar response in the Senate. I am heartily in favor of the item above referred to, contained in the bill under consideration, and also the enactment into general law of the bill H. R. 7195, introduced by my colleague, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky.

There was a time when practically every farmer was a horse breeder and a horseman. They rode horses, understood horses, and loved horses. In recent years, however, the production of good riding horses has decreased in about the same ratio in which motor transportation has increased.

Before the Great War a few far-sighted men recognized the seriousness of the situation and a comparatively small fund was provided with which the Bureau of Animal Industry purchased a few blooded stallions, which were placed in competent hands in a small section of the country. The Quartermaster General, having charge of the acquisition of horses for the Army, had the get of those horses inspected and when they developed properly purchased those suitable for Army purposes. That was a small beginning. The result was grossly inadequate to the necessity that soon arose. There were far from enough horses to supply the need of the great emergency.

The world was aflame with war. Our country was hurled into the maelstrom of universal carnage. The seductive effect of peace and prosperity had been to lull us into a false sense of security. We had not heeded the sage admonition of the Father of his Country that adequate preparation for war is the most effectual means of preserving peace.

Overnight we exchanged the habiliments of peace for the panoply of war. Preparedness became our watchword. Men, women, and children of every rank and condition, color, caste, and creed served and sacrificed with exalted ideals and sublime patriotism. The man power of the United States was mobilized with incredible swiftness and unsurpassed patriotism. No braver men ever wore any country's uniform than the Americans who met the challenge of military autocracy in 1917 and 1918. Labor demonstrated its patriotism and contributed its full share to the stupendous effort of our country in its hour of need. The farmers exerted themselves to the utmost without counting cost in producing food for our Army and the world. Our citizens responded ardently and unstintedly to the financial requirements of the crisis. Railroads and other agencies of transportation fulfilled every expectation. The greatest industrial nation on the earth, our commercial supremacy asserted itself. Our mechanical genius demonstrated its superiority. With astounding speed our factories supplied the shoes and clothing, the chemicals, the munitions, the arms, and armaments that we and our allies needed.

All these things were done so quickly as almost to stagger the imagination, but there was one of the necessaries of armed conflict, one of the most-needed items in our program of defense, that could not be supplied with celerity. Said Maj. Gen. B. F. Cheatham, the Quartermaster General, in an address at Nashville, Tenn., September 7, 1926:

> Nature demands at least six years to produce a horse suitable for a cavalryman to ride.

Our allies purchased in this country from 1914 to 1918 approximately 1,300,000 horses and mules. Most of those they bought were far from suitable for the rigorous use to which they had to be put.

At the beginning of the war there were only 39,000 horses and mules in the Army of the United States. Farmers, breeders, dealers, sportsmen—patriots all—rallied to the call of a newly organized remount service. They scoured the country from ocean to ocean seeking to buy horses that could do the work. It was a task impossible of accomplishment. They bought 320,000 horses and 160,000 mules, but too many of those were not fit. They could not stand the pace. They did not have the blood. They had not been conditioned and trained.

Motor trucks served their purpose; but where the surfaced roads ended and the mud began; where there were no bridges, and where timbers were felled and shell craters yawned; in detours around barbed-wire entanglements; in the dead of winter, when death lurked near, and American doughboys ready to go over the top and out into the death and destruction, into the hell of no-man's land, waited anxiously in a dugout for food and ammunition and the satisfying "fag"—the motor vehicle was not equal to the task. The horse and the mule must save the day. And countless times they did.

General Pershing said of the Army mule:

> You can pack him, drive him, or ride him; you can starve him, beat him, and neglect him—you can do all sorts of things to him that you can not do to an automobile, and he will be there just as long as he has four legs to walk on.
> It was a pitiful sight during the war to see horses and mules, splendid and faithful to the last, drop by the roadside, exhausted from lack of food or shot to pieces by artillery.

It is admitted that horses are necessary in concealing machine guns in difficult and obscure locations. It is not disputed that horses are needed to move artillery noiselessly and slowly in support of infantry.

But it is urged that cavalry belongs to the pages of history and is not effective in modern warfare. Nothing could be further from the truth. General Pershing and other eminent authorities contradict such a contention. The airplane is of great value in reconnaissance work, but in some kinds of weather, in some atmospheric conditions, it can not serve the purpose, and cavalry is necessary. A great American soldier has said:

> In scanning a large wooded area for the enemy the aviator can only say, "I did not see the enemy"; cavalry, on the other hand, may well bring the report, "We have been through the woods and the enemy is not there." Both the cavalry and the air service of an army are needed for reconnaissance, and one complements the work of the other.

Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, United States Army, retired, in a radio address at New York, January 21, 1926, made the following convincing statement in answer to those who no longer regard extensive cavalry operations as important:

> In the World War we saw really an army of cavalry operating on the flank of the allied battle line in a war of movement that extended from Rumania to the Suez Canal. Every allied army commander on the western front wished for cavalry in those days between July 18 and November 11, 1918. On the brown Mesopotamian plains, where the wars of mankind first began, Allenby's cavalry demonstrated that mounted operations on a large scale are still in the war picture. The picture has changed only in scale and war demands more cavalry than ever. Cavalry means horses in great quantities.

It has been estimated that in event of another great war we would need 350,000 horses and 300,000 mules at the beginning. The lowest reasonable estimate of necessary replacements is 3 per cent, or 19,500 head, per month, or nearly a quarter of a million a year.

Mr. Chairman, that presents a very serious problem. Have we learned in the bitter school of experience the folly of unpreparedness? When the war was over a new and larger remount service was organized. The Congress of the United States lent its aid; the Remount Bureau of the War Department, the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, and the cavalrymen and artillerymen of both the Regular Army and the National Guard joined in the work. Enthusiastic cooperation and material support came from members of such organizations of patriotic devotees of the horse as the American Remount Association, the Thoroughbred Horse Association, the American Saddle Horse Breeders' Association, the Trotting Horse Breeders' Association, and the Horse Association of America. They have done a great deal to popularize the plan throughout the country.

The purpose is to encourage the breeding of good horses by providing good sires. The remount service started in 1921 with 183 stallions; at the end of the fiscal year 1927 it owned 522 stallions, 461 of which were thoroughbreds. A great many of them were donated to the service by thoroughbred breeders, who also have offered prizes for remount colts. Other stallions were purchased by the Government. Those 522 stallions are located in 42 States and Territories. The fees are exceedingly small. Many breeders keep them at their own expense. As a result the average maintenance cost last year was only $377 per stallion.

From 1921 to 1926, inclusive, there were produced approximately 40,000 remount colts and fillies. The approximate value of the 1926 crop alone to the farmers owning them was $1,500,000. Most of them are at least half thoroughbred and are excellent potential Cavalry horses. The farmer sells his best colts to private owners at fancy prices while the Government buys those of average quality, taking its chance in the open market against all other prospective purchasers.

With the passage of H. R. 7195, introduced by Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, and the continuance of annual appropriations for the remount service in a few years there will be no such dearth of horses suited for Army purposes as there has been in the past.

The exquisitely beautiful bluegrass region of Kentucky, the heart of which is in the historic congressional district which has honored me with a commission as its Representative in this House, is unquestionably the greatest nursery of the American thoroughbred, the American standard-bred trotter, and the American saddle horse in the world. Its leadership as the birthplace and home of those types of horses is undisputed and unquestioned. Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, surely must have returned from a visit to that marvelously beautiful section, that undulating bluegrass pasture land, with its carpet of perennial verdure, when he said that grass—> bears no blazonry or bloom to charm the senses with fragrance or splendor, but its homely hue is more enchanting than the lily or the rose.

The limestone formation underlying the bluegrass region of Kentucky transmits to its soil an unsurpassed fertility and imparts to the bluegrass itself substance that incites physical development in horses that feed upon its luxuriance and gives to them bone and muscle and heart, speed, weight-carrying ability, endurance, stamina, and courage, qualities that have brought to Kentucky's equine kings and queens the crown of supremacy in the tan-bark ring and to her fleet-footed thoroughbreds the floral wreath of conquerors on the turf.

The blood of the Kentucky trotter in the remount service will carry on in artillery and transport horses. Gen. Basil W. Duke and Gen. John B. Castleman, both knightly Kentucky gentlemen who rode with the intrepid John Hunt Morgan in the sixties, have left beautiful tributes to the superior qualities of the saddle-bred horse for cavalry service, eloquently depicting his powers of endurance, his smooth action and easy gaits, his cheerful response to kind and careful treatment.

Both the standard-bred trotter and the saddle-bred horse have a strong infusion of the patrician blood of the thoroughbred. General Harbord said:

> This blood, above all others, carries with it the qualities of courage, stamina, and speed which are so essential to the saddle horse for military purposes. It will be a sad day for our country if it is permitted to disappear.

After the endurance test of 1922, Maj. Charles L. Scott, chairman of the breeding committee of the American Remount Association, paid tribute to the thoroughbred in the following language:

> A thoroughbred has won the two real 300-mile endurance rides this year—Norfolk Star in Colorado and Vendetta in Vermont. The former horse ridden under terrific heat, and at a very high altitude—the latter in cold and severely trying weather. We may say, therefore, that the thoroughbred has shown this year that this breed is the equal, if not the superior, of any other breed under any conditions, regardless of climate, altitude, or terrain. This breed has demonstrated this year that it has the speed, the bone, the substance, the weight-carrying ability, the stamina, and the courage to defeat the best of other breeds, and the result sets at rest all idle, senseless talk of the thoroughbred being of no value except for racing. All true students of the light horse know that the blood is found in all sections of the United States, and, no matter what cross, the result is always an improvement. This fact is known to the western farmer, the cow puncher, the polo player, the hunting man, and the man of all walks and conditions of life who is open minded and fair and a student of the horse.

In reading the history of the thoroughbred and his ancestors we learn that among the royal patrons of the horse centuries ago were William the Conqueror; Edward III; Henry VII; Henry VIII; Queen Elizabeth; James I, who rode horseback to Westminster Hall; Charles I; Charles II, who introduced eastern blood into England; James II; and William III, during whose reign appeared in England the first of three stallions, to one of which every modern English and American thoroughbred traces ancestry in direct male line. He was an eastern horse, Byerly Turk.

The other two founders of the thoroughbred race were Godolphin Barb and Darley Arabian. Every other male line has disappeared. Not only does the thoroughbred trace his ancestry to those three sires, but the fastest trotters the world has produced are scions of the house of Hambletonian, a descendant of Darley Arabian, and the greatest saddle horses that ever carried the blue ribbon from a show ring traced their lineage through Denmark to Byerly Turk, the first of the triumvirate of founders of the thoroughbred race.

The seventh congressional district of Kentucky, of which Lexington is the center and metropolis, is the home of the blooded horse, the capital of the horse kingdom, and the mecca of horse lovers throughout the world. There was organized the body of Confederate Cavalry, under the command of the dashing, daring Morgan, that revolutionized the tactics, methods, and uses of cavalry in warfare. Young men, the flower of the Anglo-Saxon race, the hope and expectancy of Kentucky, accomplished horsemen, expert marksmen, the annals of war contain no record of a braver, knightlier, more intrepid soldiery. The name of their gallant leader, John Hunt Morgan, whose equestrian statue adorns the historic Courthouse Square at Lexington, is carved in the pantheon of immortality beside the names of those other great cavalry leaders, Jeb Stuart, Joe Wheeler, and "the Marshal Ney of the Confederacy," Nathan Bedford Forrest.

The land that produced such cavalrymen as rode with Morgan and Breckinridge, Duke, and Stoner, will always be the home of the horse and the home of horsemen whose devotion to that noble animal, the companion of brave men in every age, will be a constant reminder that our word chivalry is from the French word cheval, a horse.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NEWTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN C. KETCHAM, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. JOHN C. KETCHAM, at Lansing, Mich., during farm week, at a time when there was probably the greatest gathering of farmers that has ever taken place in the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech recently delivered by his colleague, Mr. KETCHAM. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech delivered by my colleague Hon. JOHN C. KETCHAM at Lansing, Mich., during farm week:

NATIONAL FARM LEGISLATION

CAUSES OF TROUBLE

As an approach to this subject suppose we first consider the condition of agriculture, and the causes that have led up to this condition. I fully indorse the declaration of the business men's commission on agriculture which recently declared that agriculture is not merely a business or an industry, but that it is a public function or service performed by individuals for the care and use of the land in the national interest. Therefore agriculture is invested with a clear and unquestioned public interest and its welfare is a matter of national consideration calling for deliberate and farsighted national policies.

Now, these, briefly, are the conditions which challenge national consideration. Agriculture is and has been seriously below the general price level since 1921. Taking 1913 as the average pre-war condition and 100 as the index to represent it, the unfavorable position of agriculture is shown by the fact that labor's index to-day is 228, and transportation's index is 157, and the general commodity index is 152, and agriculture's index is only 138. Comparing farm prices at the farm with wholesale prices represented by the commodity index, we find the comparative value of the former, however, only 91. While this is a great improvement over 1921, when this latter index was only 69, the fact remains that the loss to agriculture in the seven intervening years is calculated at $9,000,000,000.

LOW FARM INCOMES

The farmer's income is both actually and relatively low. After business expenses and taxes were paid last year the average surplus was $627. The farmers are 25 per cent of our people, but receive only 10 per cent of the country's income. The farmer's wealth is one-fifth of the country's total, but the farmer's income is only one-tenth of the country's total.

Farm taxes are rapidly encroaching upon capital instead of being paid out of income. Compared with 1913, the tax index is now 250. Last year the tax average was 33 per cent of the net farm income. Direct Federal taxes on farmers have been virtually wiped out by exemptions and low rates. For instance, Branch County, in Michigan, had only five Federal income-tax payers outside of cities and villages in 1925. Washtenaw County had but 34, and Lenawee and Kalamazoo

Counties each had but 75. Meanwhile, farm property values are down to an index of 119 from a much higher index in 1921, and there has been a loss in farm population of 3,000,000 since 1920. I claim that this presents a picture which no straight-thinking American citizen can longer ignore.

TROUBLE FROM DEFLATION

Now, what are the causes of these farm troubles? First, there was the deflation of 1921. Everyone suffered during this readjustment and agriculture suffered more than others because of lack of organization and the difficulty of quick turnovers. In any price depreciation the farmer goes down lowest and stays down longest. This is the primary reason why he will never vote to repeal our protective tariff system. The second reason for trouble was expansion and overproduction resulting from the war demands which opened up millions of acres of new production. It has been hard to let go after this machinery has been geared up.

Seasonal price fluctuations also have played havoc. It is stated that 75 per cent of both wheat and cotton are marketed by farmers in the first three months after maturity. This is the period of low prices and strikes with great force the poor farmer who must sell regardless of markets.

Then comes the most serious factor of all; namely, great surpluses. In wheat, for instance, we have an average of 200,000,000 bushels above home consumption demands. This must find a foreign market at the world price. This world price in turn reflects on the part of the crop sold at home in spite of a tariff of 42 cents. This tariff does keep out low-priced foreign-grown wheat and the tariff is necessary for that reason. But when the surplus gets outside the United States, the tariff does not help and the lower wheat prices reflect back to our great disadvantage. If we had no surplus of wheat, as I think we should have, the tariff of 42 cents would be fully effective as it now is on butter, wool, etc. The alternative, as I see it, is to supplement our present tariff system by some new agency which puts wheat and other surplus crops into the tariff picture. That is exactly the object to be served by the export debenture plan, which I shall explain in a moment.

IT IS EVERYBODY'S PROBLEM

Now, having defined the problem and the causes for it, let us seek a practical, rational, workable program which can speed prompt and progressive agricultural prospectus. How can this be done? First, we must have sympathetic and helpful appreciation of the seriousness of the problem by all of our people. It is not the farmers' problem alone. It is the problem of all business men and all industry and all consumers, because we all go up or down together in the last analysis.

We must have education and research. Progress is the keynote of success everywhere and especially so in farming, because no business calls for a wider range of accurate and up-to-date information. All agencies that contribute to this end should be encouraged.

Then comes the factor of organization—not organization against other groups, but organization for agriculture. Farmers must awaken to this necessity as never before to the end that they shall cooperate not only among themselves but with other economic groups in the country.

Then comes the major contemplation. What can legislation do?

In the first place it should soft pedal all reclamation and irrigation projects until additional land is actually required. Fifteen million acres have gone out of cultivation east of the Mississippi in five years, according to Secretary Jardine. No new farm areas are necessary or required by the Nation at large at the present time. On the other hand legislation should earnestly back up the development of inland waterways and the St. Lawrence waterway and lower water transportation costs generally, because, for example, more than 5 per cent per bushel on wheat can be saved thereby.

Then, the farmer should be put into the tariff picture by new and higher rates on his competitive products. We imported last year more than $2,000,000,000 of agricultural products—many of which displace our own products and thus drive farmers into further production in other lines. Corn, oils, eggs, sugar, fruits, and vegetables are illustrative of crops which should be protected by new and higher tariff.

But now comes the most important consideration of all. Price levels must be stabilized in line with some of the many proposals now pending before Congress. Some plan must be devised to make the tariff effective on those crops which now have high enough rates but where the surplus kills the effect of the tariff. The McNary-Haugen bill sought to do this thing. It was and still is opposed by President Coolidge. It was and still is problematical in much of its practical prospectus. Its equalization fee was and is of questionable constitutionality.

Even those who believe in the McNary-Haugen bill must admit that any possibility of its adoption and utility is at least three crop years away—two by Coolidge's veto and at least one more in which to set up its machinery and test its constitutionality. Agriculture can not afford to wait through three more crop years for the assistance to which it is entitled. I believe the export debenture plan is simpler, better, more practical, and unquestionably constitutional. But whether it is better or not, the fact remains that this plan could move into operation this very year if passed by Congress. We could initiate the great experimental adventure of bringing farm prosperity up to par. We dare not longer postpone the initiation of helpful legislation.

In the face of these disabilities, should agriculture entrench at Washington and demand the McNary-Haugen bill or nothing? I think not. On the contrary, I think there is a better answer. I believe the alternative is constitutional, economically sound, practical, simple, and in line with our traditional protective-tariff policy. It is not revolutionary. It is not socialistic. It will be presented in complete legislative form during the next congressional week. I challenge the concentrated attention of the country to it. I challenge unprejudiced consideration by agriculture itself. Now, this is the proposal and an explanation of how it would work. It is identified as the National Grange plan.

EXPORT DEBENTURE PLAN

The export debenture plan is a straightforward attempt to bring tariff benefits to those agricultural products at present unable to take advantage of the protective-tariff system because of small exportable surpluses which tend to depress domestic prices to the world level.

Equality between agriculture and the industrial and commercial groups could be restored either by pulling down the artificial high-price structure made possible for these latter groups through such legislative devices as protective tariffs, immigration restriction, railroad-rate guaranties, exclusive patents, and tariff rebates, or the readjustment could be made by enabling agriculture to take advantage of similar devices to raise itself to this same price level and thus meet the difference in costs of production here and abroad. The National Grange prefers the latter—the constructive method—rather than the destructive and disruptive method.

Since the inequalities resulting from the tariff system are the chief source of difficulty, the logical and sensible thing to do is to apply the remedy at that point. The export debenture or bounty plan is, in fact, a recognized supplement to the protective-tariff system in many nations to-day and was proposed by Alexander Hamilton as a part of the original tariff system in the United States.

TREASURY CERTIFICATES

Stated in the simplest terms the export debenture plan is an arrangement whereby exporters of those agricultural products of which we produce a surplus receive from the Treasury Department certificates having a face value established by Congress and intended to represent the difference in costs of production between here and abroad, such certificates being negotiable and good for their face value in the payment of import tariffs on any articles later imported.

The farmer, cooperative organization, or commercial exporter may not desire to import directly, but the certificates would be readily negotiable to American importers at a slight discount. Naturally the effect of such an arrangement would be immediately to raise by approximately the amount of the export debenture the prices of those farm products now held down to the foreign level. This would follow, because any holder of these products could readily sell his supply in the foreign market at the foreign price and get, in addition thereto, the value of the export debenture or certificate. He is therefore able and willing to pay a higher price, and the general price level for these crops in this country would rapidly ascend by approximately the amount of the export debenture.

The grange plan provides that at the beginning only one-half the existing tariff rates would be given in debenture payment. For example, the present tariff on wheat is 42 cents a bushel. A cooperative association or grain dealer in Kansas desiring to ship wheat to Liverpool would receive the Liverpool price plus a certificate or debenture having a face value amounting to 21 cents for each bushel exported. Unless the exporter himself desired to bring in goods and use his debentures to pay the import duties or tariffs on these imports, he would sell his debentures to persons in the importing business. Since these debentures would be worth full face value in paying import duties, the importer would be eager to get them and would pay face value less a nominal exchange discount.

RATES ARE ADJUSTABLE

The grange plan provides that the President may adjust the debenture rates applying to the several farm crops, either upward or downward, to the extent of 99 per cent. Whenever investigations show that the rates set in the act do not cover the difference in costs of production between here and abroad the rates may be raised. Whenever the exportable surplus increases unduly the debenture rates may be reduced as a means of discouraging overproduction.

With the export debenture plan of farm relief no money would be taken out of the United States Treasury, but, of course, the cash receipts of the Treasury would be less, since a portion of the import duties would be paid with debentures instead of with cash, as at present. Exactly the same thing happens, however, whenever Congress increases tariff rates so as to protect our manufacturers against foreign competitors. If the desired purpose is accomplished, imports are shut off and the money from import duties is kept out of the United States Treasury. Theoretically, at least, the money thenceforth goes into the pockets of the American manufacturer and his laborers.

SIMPLICITY OF OPERATION

One great advantage of the export debenture plan as compared with the equalization fee plan is its extreme simplicity of operation. No complicated machinery is required, no elaborate new boards or commissions, in fact no large appropriation is required, although a modest fund for administration would be needed. The Treasury Department would issue these debentures just as it now issues "drawback" certificates, tobacco revenue stamps, and similar instruments having a recognized value that must be protected. Officials already stationed at export ports are capable of certifying to the amount of the various crops exported and designating the persons entitled to receive the export debentures.

Opponents of the export debenture plan usually base their opposition on the plea that it is a subsidy. The plan is no more a subsidy than is the protective tariff. The very purpose of our protective tariff is to prevent foreign low-cost goods from coming into the United States. By this means large quantities of dutiable goods are kept out and hundreds of millions of dollars in duties are prevented from entering our Treasury. For instance, when the duty on aluminum was more than quadrupled in September, 1922, the Treasury income from that source dropped from an average of about $2,000,000 for the preceding three years to an average of $514,000 for the succeeding four years. This protection results in great benefits to manufacturers and their employees, and the cost of this protection is borne by consumers of these articles—that is, by the general public.

SAME THING HAPPENS

Exactly the same thing happens where the export debenture plan is in operation. Less tariff receipts enter the Treasury, but our producers of farm crops are benefited. Consumers, including farmers, pay slightly more for some of their foods, as their contribution toward making the protective tariff system actually protective for agriculture. Consumers likewise pay for the benefits expected by farmers under the equalization fee plan as proposed in the McNary-Haugen bill.

The export debenture plan is not as much a subsidy as the tariff drawback privilege now accorded many American manufacturers, or the tariff reductions given Cuban sugar, greatly to the benefit of American capitalists. Under the tariff-drawback arrangement our manufacturers are actually paid what amounts to an export bounty on goods sold abroad. They receive cash payments from the Government in proportion to the amounts of goods exported.

This practice is based on the theory that our manufacturers should not be compelled to pay duties on raw materials imported for manufacture and later included in manufactured articles sold abroad. It is contended that the manufacturer can not afford to pay the protected domestic price for these imported materials if he is to sell abroad at world price levels. This is exactly the contention of the American farmer; he can not pay the protected price for labor, supplies, and other production factors and at the same time sell at the foreign price level not only abroad but at home as well.

WAY SUGAR TARIFF WORKS

Our Government allows Cuba a great advantage over other foreign countries and it is a tremendous benefit to American capitalists who now dominate the Cuban sugar situation, as well as to American manufacturers who sell goods to Cuba. Incidentally this 20 per cent tariff reduction removes by just that degree the tariff protection needed by sugar cane and beet farmers in the United States. This special concession to Cuba, and indirectly to American capital and industry, has kept out of the United States Treasury sugar duties amounting to not less than $135,000,000 in the last five years.

The farmer is asking merely that there be applied to his problem some of the same spirit of tariff adjustment and modification as is already being used to accommodate industry and capital.

HOW MUCH WOULD IT COST?

The grange plan definitely limits the maximum amount of debentures in any year to 50 per cent of the tariff revenues. At the debenture rates proposed it is estimated that the total value of debentures issued on agricultural exports during 1927 would have been about $175,000,000.

The United States Treasury would pay out nothing. But revenues from import duties would be reduced—just as they are reduced by the Cuban sugar tariff differential, draw-back privileges, and prohibitive tariffs—and this amount would have to be made up in other ways. Some of it could be sacrificed through tariffs on other food products that compete with American agriculture—tropical fruits, for instance. If instead of reducing corporation taxes the present schedule of tax rates be retained for a time, the tax revenues would probably be ample to make up for any decline that might result in import revenues. Surely industry and labor would profit from improved agricultural conditions far more than from the small tax cut that is contemplated at the present time.

FOOD COSTS INCREASED

Food costs need not be increased to any appreciable extent, and in many instances not at all. The price paid by the consumer bears so little direct relation to the price received by the farmer that the increase in the wholesale price might be entirely offset by more efficient distribution. For instance, the wheat in the average 8.55-cent loaf of bread costs only 1.15 cents, according to a recent report of the Federal Trade Commission. Allowing the 21-cent increase in the price of a bushel of wheat under the export debenture plan, this would amount to only about 0.15 part of a cent increase in the cost of the wheat required in the loaf of bread. Since the margin between the baker and the consumer is about 6.5 cents, this added small fraction of a cent in cost could readily be covered through better efficiency in distribution and cause no increase in the retail price of bread.

The increased income which would come to farmers with the export debenture plan in operation would act as a stimulus to the various lines of commercial activity. The farmer must of necessity spend nearly all he makes, and the manufacturer, distributor, and banker would each get his share of this increased business. But in the process new life would be put into agriculture and the farmer encouraged to go ahead with his program of self-help and improved efficiency in production and marketing. The economic structure would again be in more equitable relationship as between the various groups and all would have benefited through the readjustment.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the following title:

H. R. 10636. An act to make an additional appropriation for the water boundary, United States and Mexico.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 9136. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] understand that this request was to be made?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is the ranking Member. I have consulted with him about the matter and it is satisfactory to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Messrs. CRAMTON, MURPHY, and TAYLOR of Colorado.

AN EXPLANATION OF THE BANKHEAD BILL PROVIDING FOR LAND SETTLEMENT AND LAND RECLAMATION BY COOPERATION OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an explanation of a reclamation bill recently introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an explanation of a reclamation bill recently introduced by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, there are several bills pending in the House and Senate on the subject of the development of rural homes by a system of governmental cooperation in the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands. A few days ago I introduced in the House a bill (H. R. 7004) providing for the same purposes—providing a national scheme for the same purposes, to include the reclamation of swamp lands, overflowed lands, and cut-over lands, in addition to the arid and semiarid lands of the West.

I do not want to trespass upon the time of the House this afternoon by submitting the remarks I have prepared in explanation of my bill, but I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may incorporate in the RECORD my explanation and analysis of that bill for the information of the Members of the House.

OUTLINE OF THE COOPERATIVE RECLAMATION ACT, H. R. 7004

The reclamation of waste land by means of irrigation or drainage has for many years been one of the settled policies of nearly all civilized governments. The reclamation of land by means of irrigation has been a settled policy of the United States for more than 20 years. It is now proposed to authorize the reclamation of lands by other means, thus making such policy applicable to all parts of the country.

Since the principal problem involved in the utilization of arid or semiarid, swamp overflow or logged-off land is a financial one, the financial plan which this bill contains is its most important feature. The financial problems incidental to land reclamation exist because of the rather long period of nonproduction which must elapse while the construction of reclamation works is in progress and while the settler is improving and preparing his land for crops. This will vary from 4 to 10 years, depending upon the magnitude of the works and the financial plan adopted. Since no legitimate profit is possible until the land has been developed to a condition of practically normal production, most reclamation projects that are privately financed prove disappointing, and because of the many disappointments that have occurred, private capital has practically retired from this field.

To-day the surplus lands of the country that possess any great agricultural value require reclamation by some means or other. While it is agreed that the reclamation of most of such land can only be successfully accomplished through the cooperation of the Government, it is believed that such work should be done in pursuance of a plan which, once inaugurated, will be self-continuing.

Such work can only be initiated through the use of funds appropriated by Congress. But inasmuch as valuable assets will be created through the wise expenditure of such appropriations, these assets should, in turn, be made the basis of further financing, thus obviating the need of any further advances by Congress. Also all sums thus appropriated should be repaid to the United States with interest. All of these results can readily be accomplished under the plan contained in this bill.

In working out this plan the fullest advantage has been taken of existing land-credit devices provided by State and Federal legislation in order that the money used for the construction of reclamation works or for loans to veterans might be returned to the fund in the shortest possible time, so as to become available for the reclamation of other land and the making of other loans, at the same time providing for the payment by the settler of the cost of such work and of such loans over a long period of years at a reasonable rate of interest.

The basis for the organization of a reclamation project is a drainage or irrigation district, as the case might be. This district has full taxing powers under the State law and the right to incur indebtedness. Such district shall be empowered to enter into a contract with the United States for the reclamation of lands within its limits, and shall vote its bonds for an amount equal to the cost of such reclamation, such cost also including interest on all advances during the period of construction. When a district has issued its bonds and deposited them with the Federal Farm Loan Board the Secretary of the Interior may proceed with the construction of the project.

The cost of constructing the first series of projects will be paid from the appropriation provided in the bill. Then when all the property of a district that is subject to assessment for the payment of its bonds is found by the Federal Farm Loan Board to have a value equal to twice the value of such bonds, such board shall sell such bonds to the investing public and the money received from such sale shall be placed in the cooperative reclamation fund. to be available for the reclamation of the lands of other projects. These will constitute a second series of projects, this process being continued series by series, without requiring any further appropriation by Congress.

The bill authorizes an appropriation of $500,000,000, to be expended over a period of 11 years, $30,000,000 during each of the first and second years, $40,000,000 the third year, and $50,000,000 each year for the next eight years.

The bill provides that the repayment of all advances made to a project from the appropriation shall begin 10 years after the completion of the works of such project under an amortization plan extending over a period not to exceed 40 years. The payment each year of 6 per cent of the total of such advances will liquidate this debt within this period with interest at 4 per cent.

The amount which will be available for this repayment will be derived from the sale of district bonds and from the payment annually into the fund of 1 per cent of the cost of each project. The amount that will be derived from these two sources will depend upon the time required for constructing the works of a project and for establishing a property value so the district bonds may be sold.

Assuming that the average time for constructing the works of a project is four years and that the accruing interest during such period, which shall be added to the amount actually expended, is 10 per cent of such amount, bonds would then be issued by the district amounting to 110 per cent of such actual expenditures. The sale at par value of ten-elevenths of such issue would return to the fund the amount that had actually been expended. This amount would immediately become available for the reclamation of other lands. The remaining one-eleventh of such bond issue would then be deposited in the fund, the annual installments for the repayment of the same being available for reinvestment, the accruing amounts finally to be applied on the repayment of the appropriation when such repayment begins. The 1 per cent of the cost of each project that will be paid into the fund each year will also be available for reinvestment and payment on account of the appropriation. The amount derived from these two sources will be sufficient to repay the appropriation with interest at 4 per cent, without diverting any part of the construction fund for such purpose.

Assuming that through the sale of district bonds the construction fund originally provided by appropriation can be turned over during an average period of six years, reclamation works costing about $3,000,000,000 can be constructed during the next 30 to 35 years.

The bill provides that the district bonds shall draw 5 per cent interest and be paid under an amortization plan during a period not exceeding 40 years. The payment each year of 1 per cent of the principal will retire the bonds within this period. Thus, while the entire cost of the project will be repaid into the fund by the district by the end of about the sixth year after the beginning of construction—being then available for the reclamation of other lands—the settler will repay such cost over a period of about 35 years through the payment of the bonds of his district, thus receiving all the benefits of long-term payments.

The annual payments of the settler on account of the reclamation of his land will be: Installment on the bonds of his district, including interest at 5 per cent and principal, 6 per cent; as additional funds for the repayment of the appropriation with interest, 1 per cent. These make a total payment of 7 per cent of the total amount of bonds issued, to begin one year after the works of the project are completed. No payments will have to be made during the period of construction.

Provision is made for the reclamation of public land in any district and for the sale of such lands to any qualified purchaser on easy terms of payment.

The Secretary of the Interior shall have control over the settlement of the land that is to be reclaimed. He shall establish the maximum area of the farm unit or holding in any project, and unless 80 per cent of all holdings in excess of the unit so established shall be reduced to such maximum area the Secretary shall not approve such project. The price and terms of payment of all excess holdings must be approved by him, and the owners of the same shall confer upon him an irrevocable power of attorney to sell such holdings to actual settlers according to the terms of a contract to be entered into with him by such owners before the project is approved.

For a period not less than six months former service men and women and the widows of men who have served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war with Germany or in any other war, or during the Mexican border trouble, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, if otherwise qualified, shall have a preference right of entry and purchase of all public lands and excess areas in a district.

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to improve any farm unit that may be available for entry or purchase by a veteran so it will be ready for actual cultivation, and he may also supervise the placing of other improvements upon such land, provided such improvements are paid for by the State or the former owner of such land or by any other agency. The Secretary is also authorized to make short-term loans to any veteran, to an amount not to exceed $2,000, for improvements on his land or the purchase of livestock and equipment. This loan is to be repaid to the fund from the proceeds of a long-term loan which he shall negotiate through the Federal land bank as soon as the value of the property is sufficient for the purpose. The proceeds of this loan may also be used for the repayment of any loan made to a veteran by the State or by any other agency or for the payment of all or any part of the purchase price of his land.

The bill provides a basis for the most practical cooperation with any State in placing veterans on reclaimed lands. By repaying the cost of reclamation through the payment of district bonds the annual installments for this purpose become a tax and will be paid as any other tax. Therefore loans made by the State or from the fund can be secured by a first mortgage, and since the existence of the district bonds will affect but little, if any, the loan value of the land, the maximum loan that is warranted by the value of land can always be made through the Federal land bank for the liquidation of such short-term obligations as the veteran may have to incur. These short-term loans and other obligations of the veteran will not likely have to run more than two to four years before their repayment in the manner provided, so only a relatively small amount of money will be required for a loan fund.

The Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized to complete projects already begun under the provisions of the existing reclamation act from the fund created by this act. But all reclamation projects, or units of projects, upon which actual construction work shall be commenced after the passage of this act, shall be organized in the manner described, and shall pay the cost of such works into the fund with interest.

It will not be claimed that the millions in our great cities and other congested centers who are to-day living in the lowest depths of poverty, and the other millions now in the swelling ranks of the unemployed, constitute the Nation's "first line of defense." On the contrary, these and the conditions against which they are compelled to struggle are felt to be the country's greatest menace. All forward-looking men and women are agreed that our national security depends upon the further development of our rural homes, not that the producing area of the country needs to be extended at this time, but that more men and women should be placed in possession of resources so they might more readily establish their economic independence. This can not be done by settling more of our population in the cities, but they must be encouraged to return to the country, back to the land. Those who are most entitled to assistance in establishing their independence in this manner are included with the millions of young men and women who stepped forward to the defense of the country in the Great War, and who may, at any time, be called upon for further sacrifice. In what spirit will the next call be met? This is a serious question and one well worth considering right at this time.

Until the deep-seated causes of the present world-wide distress are removed, prosperity can not come back to us through any struggle that we might make for industrial supremacy. The odds are against us. Instead of spending sleepless nights over plans for controlling the markets of hundreds of millions of people too poor to buy, why not consider plans with a view to preventing our own people from sinking to the economic level of the people of Europe? The fact is our overdeveloped industries have failed us at a most critical time. As a consequence of this, millions are now looking into a future that holds but little hope.

However, nature is more kind. She does not close the door in the face of her children, but her bounties are ever recurring. This is why those on the land are safe. But life in these perilous times for many, many millions in the great cities of this and other countries is most precarious. Armies and navies can not combat the forces which threaten the world to-day. Other means will have to be employed.

Only by increasing the purchasing power of our own people and the extension of our home markets can the economic balance in this country be restored. This can most readily be done through the further development of our own natural resources, but this must be in a way which will establish the economic independence of more people. More homes must be established, and these must be rural homes. Their existence will permanently strengthen the country's real "first line of defense," which is the happiness, contentment, and loyalty of the great common people.

This is the broad purpose of the bill described. The appropriation each year for the next 11 years would just about pay for one first-class fighting ship. However, such appropriation would provide permanent homes for more than 100,000 people and would afford permanent employment through new wants that would be created for as many more. This is the kind of constructive statesmanship which through the operations of the reclamation act have placed more than 250,000 people on once desert land, created a property value of more than $500,000,000, from which every year there is returned a gross revenue greatly exceeding the entire cost of the works that have been constructed by the Government.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE RIVER

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 5583, granting the consent of Congress to the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near Presidio, Tex., and agree to the Senate amendment

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 5583, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 6099, granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York and Vermont to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain between Crown Point, N. Y., and Chimney Point, Vt., and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 6099, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MAAS, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN H. BARTLETT, FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made by First Assistant Postmaster General John H. Bartlett at the McKinley Day celebration held in Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of John Henry Bartlett, First Assistant Postmaster General, at the McKinley banquet, at Dayton, Ohio, on the evening of January 27, 1928:

MCKINLEY THE ADVANCE AGENT OF PROSPERITY

Gentlemen of the McKinley Club, under the inspiration of a name forever memorable in American annals, Republicans of this great State are gathering for conference, to the end that party principles may be recalled and party plans conversed, and all to the greater end that our country may be the better governed. The memory of the last of our Civil War Presidents comes back to us vividly to-night and challenges to the fore the noblest impulses that thrill men with love for their country. We do well, gentlemen, now and then to throw on the screen of imagination in bold and beautiful relief for the stimulation of our faith that sterling character in American history who so enriched posterity with his brain and his blood, that splendid American statesman; yes; that ardent Republican, William McKinley.

M'KINLEY AND THE TARIFF

He served his time and generation exceedingly well. No man can do more than that. We are not recalling his name for party exaltation, although that is our privilege. We are not simply extolling him as a soldier boy of 18, who early proved his title to manhood by volunteering into the fighting lines under the cause of Abraham Lincoln, although McKinley the soldier is a theme which may profitably occupy any evening. Neither are we glorifying him now solely because this club bears his name and this is the season of his birth; but we are sighting back to him and his ideals down the line of 30 years because McKinley was the one man who proved, actually demonstrated, that American prosperity and American standards can not be maintained long on a scale two or three hundred per cent higher than that of other nations without the aid of some system of financial protection—in other words, without a protective tariff, even although our productivity per man is greater than theirs. That was the verdict of the people of his day, as decisively rendered and formally recorded as any of the crystallized facts of our national political history. And subsequent industrial events have continued to reaffirm that judgment. If there any longer remains a doubt on the subject of tariff protection in the minds of honestly influenced statesmen, it is not a doubt concerning the wisdom of the principle itself, but only such doubts as may naturally arise on the application of this principle to the rapidly changing industrial, commercial, and agricultural phases of our country.

M'KINLEY'S VISION

McKinley had the vision to see this principle ahead of and more clearly than most other men at a time when it would have been national shipwreck for some one not to have seen it. By it and through it the country has prospered beyond McKinley's dreams and almost beyond our own comprehension. Let us recall that the McKinley method of tariff reasoning was "high wages first," and as cheap necessities of life thereafter as possible. The method of reasoning of his opponents was the reverse, namely, "cheap necessities first," with wages coming as a secondary consideration. These two schools of thought, these two methods of reasoning, are still existent and, as it was in the beginning, they lead the reasoners to widely different conclusions on the application of the protective-tariff principle. It is necessary, therefore, that the American voter himself should never lose sight of the principles as they were so vividly understood during the days of McKinley. Such meetings as this which bring into fresh review the life of McKinley should also bring into fresh contemplation the principles of protection and his methods of reasoning concerning them, so that we may not be misled by specious argument to the contrary. I do not mean that we should study the application of the protective-tariff principle to each of the thousands of commodities and products which have to be studied by the lawmaking powers, but I do mean that we should never lose sight of the principle, and that we should never fail to grasp what McKinley so readily grasped and so forcibly presented, that high wages—good wages—must ever be the first and paramount consideration, and that a high civilization is always the handmaiden of high wages. We should not indolently fall into the false line of philosophy that that which produces low prices in the necessities of life is paramount. It is important, of course, but not of the first consideration. If low prices in the necessities of life are first consideration and wages secondary, then it follows that we admit free of duty in competition with ourselves the products of the farms and the workshops where labor is more poorly paid.

We Republicans contend that the danger from cheap foreign products may be averted in this country by a protective tariff if and where such protection for such purpose is actually needed. That is the Republican policy. That was the McKinley philosophy.

THE TARIFF AND DEMOCRATS

It is not easy to state the tariff attitude of our opponents, for they have never copyrighted any fixed ideas thereon. To be sure, they twice had chances and twice accepted those chances, laboring and bringing forth the Wilson-Gorman tariff and the Underwood tariff. And although these laws were later repealed, the tear stains on the shirts of American workmen have never yet completely faded out. It is not my purpose to discuss items of the tariff. In fact, it is not clear at this time what the attitude of our opponents may be on the tariff. It certainly is true that they have been defeated at the polls so many times on the tariff issue that they are beginning to feel the sting of these defeats and are rather inclined to side-step the issue altogether. But this does not mean that Republicans should be lulled into indifference or regard the protective tariff system as not constantly requiring advocates and defenders. It is one of those principles which must be kept before the American people in order that they may see and realize its value. The voters should not be satisfied with the Democratic attitude on the tariff this year unless they, in their platform, flatly declare that they are for it.

AMERICAN PEOPLE PRACTICAL

But our opponents bitterly dislike to admit that they have been wrong on the tariff. In fact, they have acquired a dislike for the tariff. Probably the greatest reason why they have had only two presidential tenants in the White House in 68 years is because of this antitariff proclivity of theirs. The American people are extremely practical and sensible. First of all, they want to get a living for themselves and their families. Laying all sentiment to one side, what they want is prosperity, business, jobs, crops, and markets. Give them these and they will do the rest. It may seem strange to some that there is existent in the country so much free-trade propaganda, that there are so many who profess to believe in it. It is because each individual argues for himself. If a given person could have protection on the thing he produces so as to get good prices for it, and at the same time free trade on everything he buys so that he may possibly buy cheaper, it is plain to see that he would like that brand of free trade. So we are apt to hear men arguing that there should be free trade in most everything, naming the things, but omitting his own line of occupation. In that particular it is something like the prohibition sophistry, namely, "good for the other fellow."

That sort of argument is selfish, narrow, and sectional. It is not the broad national viewpoint which McKinley advocated and which opened the floodgates of prosperity in this country. These free-trade or low-tariff speech makers address the wage earners at the mill gates about thus:

TYPICAL FREE-TRADE SPEECHES

"You are paying too much for your food, due to existing tariff rates keeping out the cheap food products from other countries. You have the right to buy wherever you can buy the cheapest, and to insure that right you should assist in repealing the tariff on farm products, so that the American markets could be supplied with the cheap land products of the Argentine, New Zealand, and Canada, the cheap dairy products of Australia and northern Europe, cheap fruit from southern Europe and Central America, and cheap eggs from China. By reason of getting these foods so cheaply from foreign countries, you could cut down your living costs and thereby be more prosperous." To the mill operatives listening to such a speech from the candidate for office it sounds convincing and they applaud vociferously, and many doubtless vote the Democratic ticket in response thereto. The deception in this is very artful. They forget to tell those wage earners that 40 per cent of the products of the American industries are bought by the agricultural producers of the country. Ruin the farmers and 40 per cent of the products of American industries are taken away, and hence 40 per cent of the American industrial laborers are put out of employment, including 40 per cent of the very men whom such speaker is addressing. Another Democratic speaker addresses a mass meeting of farmers and tells them that if they had free trade in the things they have to buy, they could get along much better, forgetting to tell them that 90 per cent of the farmers' output is bought and consumed by these same well-paid industrial wage earners in the United States, forgetting to tell them that if they bought from free-trade labor outside the country they would thereby eject from employment much of the American well-paid industrial labor and thus destroy the good market for their own output. In other words, the different elements of our country, the different industries, and occupations, have their prosperity so interlinked one with the other that they must both prosper together or both suffer adversity together. This is not only reasonable but it has been the history of our country. They must together preserve the American market for American products of all kinds so far as practicable.

TARIFF SHOULD BE JUST HIGH ENOUGH

There is an all-important distinction between a tariff that is high enough to protect and a tariff that is just too low to protect. A very few cents in the tariff may make the difference between the prosperity of an industry and its complete collapse. A foreign country that can undersell the product of an American industry or of agriculture even a little in any particular item can drive that item out of business. The so-called Wilson-Gorman tariff enacted during the administration of President Cleveland was too low to protect many American industries, and you gentlemen here all too vividly recall the painful unemployment over this country at that time, so great unemployment that whole armies of idle men marched across the continent to Washington carrying banners reading, "We don't want charity; we want work." McKinley set out to remedy that condition. McKinley's policies finally restored the country from that crisis. Then again we all remember the condition of business in 1920 and 1921—that is, after the World War—when the effect of the Democratic Underwood tariff was getting in its work.

POMERENE TESTIFIES

While we remember this I propose to summon a witness to prove it, and I will summon your distinguished Ohio citizen, ex-Senator Pomerene, who in the United States Senate on January 31, 1921, spoke as follows:

"I sent out a questionnaire into every chamber of commerce and every central labor union in cities of 10,000 or over in my State, and word comes back from nearly every one of these industrial centers that about 40 per cent of the workingmen of the country are out of employment."

I am citing this in order that you may absolutely know by incontrovertible evidence that labor conditions were desperate when the Harding administration came in nearly seven years ago. People are so apt to forget this, particularly when our opponents are asserting to the contrary. And I am stating this also as an item in our argument that the protective tariff has always been invoked as a remedy against unemployment, and protection so stimulates business that it leads to new machinery and mass production, ofttimes lowering prices in the end. I am also referring to the benefits of the tariff to glorify the wisdom of the original "advance agent of prosperity," whose name we are acclaiming to-night.

MISREPRESENTATIONS

Gentlemen of the McKinley Club, since we are Republicans here together to-night, may we not talk frankly about our party, which McKinley loved? Our opponents really have formulated nothing so far, as indicated by their speeches, which may be called "issues." This they practically admit. Thus far their appeals are limited to pleas for needed harmony among themselves and to outlawed dissertations on individuals now or formerly in the Republican Party. It might seem wiser for me to make no reference whatever to their repeated attempts to create the impression that Democrats are more honest than Republicans.

DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS BOTH HONEST

First, let me say as an optimist, believing in American manhood and patriotism, that as a rule, emphasizing the word "rule," both Republican and Democratic officials are honest. It must not be thought that official Washington now consists of Republicans only. As a matter of fact, our system is now so developed at the Capital that although the Republicans are nominally in power, there are nearly as many Democrats in the potent official positions in Washington as there are Republicans. My positive testimony is that during the six years while I have had contact with all these higher officials of both parties there has not come to my personal knowledge one instance of dishonesty nor a single transaction in which I had any suspicion of dishonesty, and I can say this as one who has supervised annually the expenditure of over $400,000,000 appropriations, and in so doing made thousands of contacts with both Republicans and Democrats in the higher positions of the Nation. In the first place, I have seen no disposition to be dishonest, and, in the second place, there are so many checks and reviews, so many officials who have something to do with each transaction, that dishonesty is practically impossible. I am perfectly sure that it is not true that Republicans or Democrats in office are dishonest as a rule. If there be dishonesty, it is the great and rare exception and it is bound eventually to be discovered. Moreover, I believe it is most harmful to the welfare of the Nation to cause the rank and file to believe what is not true—that their officials are generally crooked and corrupt. I deem it distinctly dishonest in a public speaker to misrepresent to an audience that an exception is the rule.

MISREPRESENTATION BREEDS ANARCHY

To cause uninformed citizens and aliens to lose faith in national honesty by false representations is but injecting germs of anarchy into unsteady minds, which conduct in times past has resulted in serious acts of violence. Such conduct has resulted in assassinations actually snatching from us in the flood tide of lofty endeavor our three martyred Presidents, Abraham Lincoln, James A. Garfield, and William McKinley, and but barely missing the fourth when an attempt was made on Theodore Roosevelt. It must be noted and noted seriously that all these assassins did their acts while seeming to believe they were serving God and their country. Gentlemen, it is fitting that "McKinley Night" should warn against tendencies which produce assassinations.

Every patriot as a matter of course will attempt to uncover dishonesty and to punish it wherever and whenever it is found. It is equally axiomatic that no patriot will represent dishonesty in government to be greater than it is. It is as censurable to represent an exception to be the rule as it is to represent an honest man to be dishonest.

PARTY MEN COMPARED

If it were material to know which party has furnished the greater number of exceptions to the rule of honesty, there might well be made a thorough canvass. But dishonesty is an individual responsibility and not a party responsibility. We are not in the habit of condemning other organizations when some individual fails. It is the attitude of the organization toward the erring individual which constitutes the acid test of the organization. In the happenings which have created so much discussion and sincere regret, it appears that the alleged millionaire tempter was a Democrat and the alleged poor man tempted was a Republican.

SLANDERING THE DEAD

Isn't it better to be frank about these matters, gentlemen, and to admit that the high officials of both parties are generally honest and that when an instance of dishonesty occurs the patriotic men of both parties join in condemnation and prosecution? And, gentlemen, let us not forget that slander and libel are hideous crimes, whether spoken of the living or of the dead.

REPUBLICAN'S 10 PRESIDENTS

But while we are in the business of comparing individuals, why should we not compare the good? Why should we not behold the great leaders of each party and compare them one against the other? They are the ones who shape the destiny of the country. If our opponents desire, I propose they match for honor and statesmanship their party leaders against our party leaders. Let them match, if they can, some one against Abraham Lincoln, some one against Ulysses S. Grant, Rutherford B. Hayes, Benjamin Harrison; yes, some one against William McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, Warren G. Harding, and, finally, some one against Calvin Coolidge. Against these names whom will they place?

TWO PRESIDENTS IN 68 YEARS

In 68 years they have produced only two—Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson. Man for man, I am quite willing to match Republicans against Democrats in every phase of our country's history and in every phase of statesmanship and honesty. I am quite willing that those who would choose their party affiliations on the basis of upright manhood should ponder on these two lists of Presidents and study them exhaustively. I am quite willing that they should study their records as Presidents and as men.

CLEVELAND AND WILSON

Now, it is only for this cursory comparison that I refer briefly to these two Presidents of our opponents. They were not successful in running the Government, although I concede they were honorable men. Grover Cleveland's administration produced one of the greatest industrial and commercial panics that ever blighted a country—the panic of 1893. It was the worst period of unemployment and suffering that labor has ever known in this country, and it was under a free-trade tariff. It is also true that during the last three years of President Cleveland's administration the income of the Government did not meet the running expenses of the Government by several million dollars each year, and this great Nation was compelled to borrow money to pay its running expenses. The Treasury condition was so bad when President McKinley succeeded Cleveland that there had accumulated the enormous deficit for those times of $137,811,729.46. Although this had been neglected for three years, President McKinley in 11 days after he took the oath of office convened Congress in extraordinary session to stop the floodgates of adversity. The Democratic convention that nominated a successor to President Cleveland did not even give him complimentary mention in their platform.

The other Democratic President whom our opponents have to match against our long line of Republican Presidents from Lincoln to Coolidge was the late Woodrow Wilson.

WILSON'S ADMINISTRATION AND THE LEAGUE

His administration is too fresh in the minds of the people for review. He was certainly unfortunate in having to go through a war. We must not charge the war to him. But the thing which stands out with reference to President Wilson mountain high in the minds of everyone, and always will, is his efforts to get our American Nation into the League of Nations. No man ever worked more persistently to accomplish something which would mean greater disaster to our people. Our souls are now filled with horror and our frames shake with fear every time we contemplate how near he came to the precipice of this undertaking. It was by the narrowest possible margin that we were kept out of that awful vortex of wars which is constantly consuming Europe, and he certainly would have succeeded in this had it not been for a stanch group of unflinching Republicans in the Senate who stood against it like the rock of Gibraltar.

REPUBLICANS BLOCKED THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Republicans then did the greatest service to the American people that has been done since they preserved the Union and made men free, for they preserved America from the bondage of European wars and forever decreed that American sons shall not be called to arms in a foreign country by the vote of a foreign body. They saved American freedom and independence. Those of us who take this view of the League of Nations never think of Woodrow Wilson except in terms of the man who made this the supreme effort of his career. He was honest of purpose, to be sure, but in him practical business judgment was wanting. He became obsessed with one idea.

HARDING AGAINST LEAGUE

The Democratic Party paid the penalty for their attitude toward the League of Nations in a defeat by the worst majority ever administered to a presidential candidate in this country, and the Republican Party for its stand in the matter met the approbation of the American people by the election of a President who stood squarely against the League of Nations, a stalwart and beloved son of your Commonwealth, the late Warren G. Harding.

WILSON WASTE

Assuming that the war was inevitable, some war debt, too, was inevitable, but it was too large. Those who witnessed the lavish expenditure of money during the war, with its perfect orgy of waste, are bound to think that the debt of $26,000,000,000 left by the Wilson administration was by far greater than it should have been, because there was no business ability or economy in that administration. Besides we were too mournful and too excited during the war to be very exacting on war contracts and matters of honest business dealing. But there is a lasting conviction in the minds of business men everywhere that the losses in money were unjustifiable and that the crumbs wasted under the table of mismanagement then were bigger than any losses that have been suspicioned or proven since.

COOLIDGE'S SUCCESSES

We all despise dishonesty in Government by officials of either party and we all eagerly join in their prosecution, and I again assert that they are the exception and not the rule. But, gentlemen, if we must bring up instances of dishonesty as the Democratic speakers are constantly essaying to do, if we must compare the exceptions of one party with the exceptions of another, let us go all the way up and down the line and do a thorough job. Personally, I believe official Washington is now beyond suspicion of dishonesty; that the Government is run on better business principles to-day than it has ever been run in the history of the country. I am sure no more honest men ever lived than both President Harding and President Coolidge. The most outstanding acomplishment of the Harding-Coolidge administration is the creation, management, and perfection of the system known as the Budget system and its accomplishments during the last six years. By the splendid direction of President Coolidge through the Budget an economy program has been carried out so sucessfully as to cut our running expenses very materially, and also to reduce the national debt about $1,000,000,000 per year. This fact also means a prosperous condition of the country. On the other hand, a bill creating a Bureau of the Budget was actually vetoed by President Wilson. When he went out of office and President Harding came in things were in bad shape generally. There were over 5,000,000 workers in this country out of employment.

HARDING AND THE TARIFF

President Harding at once recommended and caused to be enacted a protective tariff with more protecting features in it. This inspired business confidence to such an extent that industries revived, and when he died so suddenly and lamentably there was scarcely a willing toiler in the country who was out of employment. History is bound to be fair with President Harding.

When you hear our opposing orators attacking Republicans ask them how our 10 Presidents compare with their 2.

WHAT DEMOCRATS WOULD HAVE DONE IF THEY COULD

When you hear them boasting of their principles you might ask them what would be America's plight to-day if the voter had actually permitted the Democratic Party to put their various platform principles into law and actual practice. Do you realize that if the Democratic platforms could have been carried out we would have practically free trade to-day? Do you realize that we would have the free and unlimited coinage of silver in the ratio of 16 to 1 to-day? And do you realize, gentlemen, that we would be in the League of Nations bound hand and foot to-day? Is not that enough to make us wary of Democratic platforms? Is there any wonder that business staggers when it thinks of the possibility of the Democratic Party formulating a new platform? These three platform principles stand out in American history as repudiated, dumped on the junk pile of political folly.

BUSINESS FEARS DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION

Is it any wonder that Democrats hesitate to experiment on a new issue, having had so much sinister luck in issue picking? The only thing I have heard from Democratic speakers of late that hints at an issue is their talk that the country is not prosperous. We traverse that issue. But if the business record of the Cleveland-Wilson administrations is kept in mind as sample doses of Democratic medicine for national ills, it seems to me we would have to be powerful sick in a business way before we would consent to a change of doctors or medicine. I am sure the Nation is not that sick yet. We must admit that the country has really had a most marvelous six years of prosperity, all in all. There is now only a very slight sagging from the very highest peak of prosperity. There are no symptoms of general relapse. The best business minds of the country now predict a huge business year in 1928. It would not be surprising if there would be aroused some nervousness over what the election may bring. This nervousness, however, is not aggravated because the people can not believe that there is any danger of another Democratic administration. If they did think there was such danger, this nervousness would develop into prostration. It would become a real disease if business was not so confident that the Coolidge policies would be carried on by the election of a Republican successor to that remarkable statesman and level-headed business man who has so completely won the confidence of both parties as well as both hemispheres.

THE PROSPERITY ISSUE

In order to create a political issue on the subject of prosperity our friends must not only claim that we have not been prosperous for the past seven years, but they must also claim that they have the exclusive formula and initiative to make us prosperous. Such claims would create an issue. On such an issue they must fail. Let us ask ourselves what national prosperity is. It may be helpful to refer to this, not that we need a defense against idle accusations, but because of pride in the accomplishment of our own Republican administration.

HIGH WAGES

I believe that practically every thinking man of any party would put at the head of the column of prosperity items the fact of "good wages for our workers." Conceding this, our argument is won, for wages are certainly the highest ever known in this country in all its history. It is needless to state that they are fully twice as high as in any other country, and five times as high as in some countries.

COST OF LIVING LOWER

And these wages have not only been made higher during the past six years, but according to official statistics, the purchasing power of wages has increased so that one dollar will now buy in food products what it took $1.20 to buy in 1920. Coincident with the highest wages the amount of unemployment has been the lowest. It began with over 5,000,000 laborers idle when President Harding was inaugurated on March 4, 1921; but it rapidly diminished to a negligible quantity, remaining there for the past five years. No further evidence of prosperity need be cited than these facts concerning wages and the employment of labor. The rest follows.

SAVINGS HIGHEST

But to continue this, let me refer to the fact that the savings deposits of our people have more than doubled since 1920, they then being $12,449,769,000 and now being $26,032,001,000.

TEMPERANCE

I am bound, however, to say that a considerable portion of this gain in savings deposits should be recorded as a credit to the effectiveness of temperance which Republicans have stood by in the past and will continue to sponsor in the future. The deposits in the United States Postal Savings System have increased in the sum of $14,089,000 during 1927, this item being significant because these deposits are largely made by the foreign element in this country who would be the first affected in case of unemployment. During the past year, the total deposits of the 100 largest national banks in the country have increased by $1,407,755,877. All these most significant banking figures Democratic orators are omitting, but are stressing the comparatively unimportant fact that a larger number of small national banks have failed than usual. This is true, but I am told it is more the outgrowth of reckless ventures in banking and poor management. This has greatly improved of late, however. The ownership of automobiles by the working people to an amazing extent needs no proof save our own daily observations, and it is further convincing evidence of our prosperity particularly when taken in connection with the increase in savings deposits.

PASSING PROSPERITY AROUND

A few years since that brilliant Republican statesman from Indiana, the Hon. Albert J. Beveridge, coined a pet expression, "Pass prosperity around," and that is precisely what the present Republican administration is accomplishing. Our own observation tells us and tells us daily that people in all walks of life in the United States are living better than ever before.

There are more sons and daughters of workmen now in college than ever before; more homes have telephones and modern equipment; more laborers and their families have good food and clothing; in short, the whole tone of civilization, so far as the enjoyment of life is concerned, is raised to a standard never before enjoyed in this or any other country. Mr. Hoover tells us there are about 6,000,000 radio receiving sets now in American homes. The pessimistic Democratic orator will have a harder time and fare worse if he undertakes an antiprosperity issue than Bryan did with his 16 to 1.

ERA OF EXPANSION

It has been and is an era of tremendous expansion, and 1928 is looked to with hopefulness by the master minds of the country in every line of endeavor. The railroads of the country during the year 1927 added 780 new locomotive engines, 1,040 passenger cars, and 275 Pullman cars, and prosperity in the air is seeming to go like a house afire. It is predicted that 3,000 new airplanes will be built in the year 1928. The Postal Service now is flying mail 17,444 miles per day and will soon add 7,000 more miles. Your own stamped-envelope factory here in Dayton has increased its output from 2,350,000,000 in 1920 to 3,145,946,376 in 1927. Yes, by and large, the country is prosperous. In fact, in certain lines there may exist apprehensions that the pace is too swift. But we have no disposition, however, to overlook those points that need stimulation and to apply every possible remedy.

A STRONG PRESIDENT NEEDED

The vital organs of the body politic are "sound," to use the words of the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton, the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon. Let us not be so overjoyed at our remarkable prosperity that we do not exercise due care in seeing to it that no weak or fractious President is put in charge of American destiny, for I believe it will require greater skill and wisdom to continue our prosperity at a reasonably high degree than it did to attain it to the degree we already enjoy. This era of prosperity has continued longer than any other prosperity cycle in our history, and because of the remarkable soundness and strength of the policies and principles of the Coolidge administration.

Holding with a determined grip to the fundamental principles of Government and to the natural laws of business, he has sought the cooperation of the leaders in every line of industry to an extent which has won their confidence and developed a spirit which is bound to win for America a continuing prosperity. He has recognized the fact that government and laws alone can not arbitrarily make prosperity, but they can do much. The Government can aid cooperation, and the Government, above all, can avoid recklessly wrecking what private genius can and will accomplish. There is still need of a man with iron in his veins at the helm.

COMPLEX BUSINESS PROBLEMS

Prosperity intoxicated by its own speed may run amuck. There is upon us an era of phenomenal evolution in industry, as great evolution, perhaps, as is taking place in invention and discovery. Gigantic corporations of world-wide activity are being formed. Railroad consolidations of staggering proportions are in the making. The new experiences of the dollar-in-the-air are thrilling men to action. International radio, international telephone, international everything seem to be the order of the day. All these and many other advances are appealing to our amazed imagination, telling us that we need giant minds at the head of our Government and that the sound policies that have brought us thus far should not be displaced by political experiments. All these things convince us—convince every serious-minded man—that if we do not have Coolidge we should take the Coolidge chart and compass and sail on to greater successes.

MUCH YET TO BE DONE

But intelligent criticism and study is necessary and is along the line of progress. We do not object to our opponents pointing out the weak places and the unprosperous spots. We know them. They know them. We only object to their saying that the country is not prosperous, and therefore needs their hands to guide it. Mr. Stewart McDonald well says: "Only the demagogue will deride those who dare to be doubtful about the industrial future of the United States. But, however great the respect to which economic pessimism is entitled, there is abundant evidence that we have entered a new age in which industry promises the triumph of mind over matter, the tapping of sources of wealth much greater than the limited gifts of nature on which we depended in the past."

We are not at all unmindful of the need for doing everything that the Government can safely do to aid in leveling up the prosperity of agriculture with other levels of prosperity. There has been improvement along this line. The prices of farm products have increased, and there are evidences of gradual recovery. The Republican Party is as determined to bring success to the farmer as it has ever been determined on any great purpose in its entire history, even as McKinley was determined. It only desires to make sure that it is applying a cure which will not kill the patient.

The President and Congress are not unmindful of the necessity of building up a great merchant marine. They are not unmindful of our purpose to begin the great internal improvements of the country. They are not unmindful of a lack of prosperity in certain textile and industrial spots. And we are all full of determination and resolve that where something must be done, where undertakings are demanded, on land or sea or air, they shall be accomplished. We only suggested that the same policies of the same party which has conducted our country through seven years of successes shall continue to conduct it, not for the benefit of the party—that is of small consideration—but for the benefit of the country, the Western Hemisphere, and the whole world.

THE LESSON OF M'KINLEY'S LIFE

Gentlemen, you do a real service to your country in annually bringing to public attention the superb statesmanship, the sterling character, and the lovable nature of one of the best and most effective Presidents in our entire history. No life could better inspire American youth. He had the gentleness of a woman yet the strength of a soldier. He possessed the sympathy of a child, yet the mental power of a giant, a tolerant Christian of unimpeachable character. He thrills me most at the beginning and at the end of his career—the two scenes. A boy of 18 years shouldering a rifle and marching with men of all ages to almost certain slaughter at a time when men's souls were numb with fear, taking his natural patriotism through fine heredity, nerving his youth at the prayerful appeal of Abraham Lincoln, comforting his mind through the fatherly benediction of his superior officer, Rutherford B. Hayes—we behold the same person who, near the end at Buffalo, mortally wounded by an assassin's bullet, President of the United States, benefactor of his countrymen, about to become another victim of the spirit of anarchy, softly saying as the mob sought to kill the deluded creature, looking down with bleeding yet pitying heart, "Don't hurt him." To-day we need this dying lesson taught by the Ohio soldier boy and martyred President. Let the acts which produce anarchy be restrained. Let lawlessness be put down. Let us get the full meaning of the life of the hero whom we glorify to-night. This wonderful State of yours, with its six and a half million people, with its twenty billions of wealth, large enough to be an empire or a republic on any other continent, rich in natural resources, diversified to the point of independence, progressive in business and philanthropy, famous in statesmen, mother of six Presidents, may well rise to a man and drink a toast to-night to one of its sons, as ideal an American as ever lived—William McKinley.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 9, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Thursday, February 9, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

(10.30 a. m.)

Department of Agriculture appropriation bill.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

(10 a. m.)

To place agricultural products upon a price equality with other commodities (H. R. 10656).

To foster agriculture and to stabilize the prices obtained for agricultural commodities by providing for the issuance of export debentures upon the exportation of such commodities (H. R. 10568).

COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS

(10.30 a. m.)

To provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses (H. R. 393).

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

(10 a. m.)

To amend Title II of an act approved February 28, 1925, regulating postal rates (H. R. 9296).

COMMITTEE ON THE MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

(10.30 a. m.)

To amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of radio communications," approved February 23, 1927 (H. R. 8825).

SENATE

THURSDAY, February 9, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, who never failest to help and govern those whom Thou dost bring up in Thy steadfast fear and love, reveal in us the love that seeks and saves, the sacrifice of reconciliation, the very force that vibrates forever across the invisible fabric of the universe out of which the worlds are woven. Thrill into flame the spirits of all great men, that they may shine as beacon lights in the world, and touch into trembling glow ten thousand times ten thousand taper points of that great multitude of Thy children—the good who are not great. Grant this, O Lord, through Him who is the light of the world, our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills:

H. R. 5583. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near Presidio, Tex.; and

H. R. 6099. An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York and Vermont to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain between Crown Point, N. Y., and Chimney Point, Vt.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES. I was requested to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 744, the so-called Jones merchant marine bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING presented the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Utah, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

STATE OF UTAH,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

I, H. E. Crockett, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the attached is a full, true, and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, by Mr. Auerbach, protesting against the passage of the Swing-Johnson bill, pending in Congress, or other similar legislation, passed by the Utah State Legislature on February 25, 1927, as appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 31st day of January, 1928.

[SEAL.] H. E. CROCKETT,
Secretary of State.

Certificate of enactment

We hereby certify that the foregoing bill, known as Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, by Mr. Auerbach, "Resolution protesting against the passage of the Swing-Johnson bill, pending in Congress, or other similar legislation," having first been regularly passed by the legislature and presented to his excellency, the governor, and the same not having been approved by him, was returned by him with his objections to the house in which it originated, to wit, the senate, which house duly entered the governor's objection at large upon its journal, and proceeded, pursuant to section 8 of article 7 of the constitution of Utah, to reconsider the bill; that after such reconsideration the said bill again passed both houses of the legislature by a yea-and-nay vote of two-thirds of the members elected to each house, to wit, by a vote of 18 yeas, 1 absent and not voting, 1 deceased in the senate, and by a vote of 45 yeas, 6 nays, and 4 absent and not voting in the house, there having been elected to the senate 20 members, 1 of whom had died and the vacancy caused by his death not having been filled, and to the house 55 members. We certify that the said bill was this 7th day of March, 1927, deposited with the secretary of state.

A. B. IRVINE,
President of the Senate.
S. M. JORGENSEN,
Speaker of the House.
H. L. CUMMINGS,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. L. CROPPER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Resolution 3, protesting against the passage of the Swing-Johnson bill, pending in Congress, or other similar legislation

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah (the governor concurring therein), That the State of Utah, through its legislature, hereby protests against the passage of the present Swing-Johnson bill, or any similar legislation, by Congress until provisions are made therein for an equitable apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River.

Resolved further, That the Governor of the State of Utah forward certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and to the Governors of the States of Arizona, Colorado, California, New Mexico, Wyoming, and Nevada.

The foregoing Senate Concurrent Resolution 3 was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the president of the senate, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 25th day of February, 1927.

A. B. IRVINE,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

H. L. CUMMINGS,
Secretary of the Senate.

The foregoing Senate Concurrent Resolution 3 was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the speaker of the house, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 25th day of February, 1927.

S. M. JORGENSEN,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

E. L. CROPPER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Received from the senate this 25th day of February, 1927.

Received from the secretary of the senate and filed in the office of the secretary of state this 7th day of March, 1927.

H. E. CROCKETT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Monterey County, Calif., remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of California, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committe on Pensions.

Mr. SIMMONS presented memorials numerously signed by citizens of Charlotte and vicinity, in the State of North Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the National Guard Association of the State of New York, favoring the passage of the so-called Tyson-Fitzgerald bills, providing for the retirement of emergency officers of the Army in service during the World War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the National Guard Association of the State of New York, favoring the passage of legislation for the holding of national shooting matches annually in connection with the School for Small Arms Firing, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of Lodge No. 22, of Bridgeport, and Elm Lodge, No. 420, of New Haven, both of the International Association of Machinists, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of legislation providing for the reconditioning of the U. S. S. Mount Vernon and the U. S. S. Monticello, so that employees of the navy yards may be kept working, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New Haven, Bridgeport, and Hamden, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Council No. 6, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Bridgeport, Conn., protesting against the repeal of the national-origins quota provision of existing law and urging Congress to carry into execution that provision of the immigration act of 1924, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Cromwell, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed naval-building program, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BROOKHART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2007) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay officers and Filipinos formerly enlisted as members of the National Guard of Hawaii for field and armory training during years 1924 and 1925, and to validate payments for such training heretofore made, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 274) thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3066) for the relief of Herman Shulof, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 275) thereon.

Mr. MAYFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3062) for the relief of Anna Faceina, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 276) thereon.

Mr. FESS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 23) providing for the participation of the United States in the celebration in 1929 and 1930 of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the conquest of the Northwest Territory by Gen. George Rogers Clark and his army, and authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a permanent memorial of the Revolutionary War in the West, and of the accession of the old Northwest to the United States on the site of Fort Sackville, which was captured by George Rogers Clark and his men February 25, 1779, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 277) thereon.

REPORT OF THE SESQUICENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE AND THOMAS JEFFERSON CENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. BINGHAM. From the Committee on Printing I report a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 143) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Report of the Sesquicentennial of American Independence and the Thomas Jefferson Centennial Commission of the United States" be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state that the estimate of the cost of this printing is given by the Public Printer at $587.23.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to submit a request for a reprint of the report which I have previously made relating to Muscle Shoals. In this report I gave the cost of nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals at something over $67,000,000. While I think that is technically correct, and it is the figure which the War Department carries on its books as the cost of that plant, at the same time I believe that it is just a little misleading. I want to reprint the report with a modification and explanation of that statement. I ask unanimous consent for a reprint with the correction I have suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. While I am on my feet I would like to give notice that, as soon as the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which is now the unfinished business, is disposed of I shall, if I can get recognition, make a motion to take up the Muscle Shoals joint resolution.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. NORBECK, the Committee on Banking and Currency was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2795) to amend subdivision c of section 47 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKHART. I introduced a bill (S. 1878) to amend section 5137 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It should have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency. With the consent of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I ask that that change of reference be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC UTILITY CORPORATIONS

Mr. BLEASE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 83) authorizing an investigation of public utility corporations, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO TAX REDUCTION BILL

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to House bill 1, the tax reduction bill, which were separately referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

IMPERIALISM IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I present an article from the World's Work for February, 1928, entitled "Are we imperialists? And what imperialism does in Central America," by Samuel Crowther, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARE WE IMPERIALISTS? AND WHAT IMPERIALISM DOES IN CENTRAL AMERICA

By Samuel Crowther

[Does the eye of Latin America, looking at our American eagle as a symbol of political liberty and freedom for all, see a vulture seeking to prey upon all backward and smaller neighbors? Shortly before the opening of the Pan American Conference at Habana and before the Lindbergh good-will flights, Mr. Crowther asked this question of the Presidents and high officials of the Central American Republics, and here he gives their answers.]

I set out to find the American imperialistic eagle. My search ranged pretty much all over Central America. Though I heard that the bird had been seen, it was always in the next country. And when I came to that country I found that it had not been there but was quite likely in some other country. Thinking that if anyone had first-hand knowledge it would certainly be the Presidents of these little Republics, I saw and talked with all of them. Here is what I saw and what they said.

I

Most of the half-million Costa Ricans are grouped on the high, rolling plateau that holds the cities of Cartago and San Jose and on a narrow strip of country extending along the railroad that follows the Reventazon River to Port Limon and the sea. The plateau grows coffee—very fine coffee, every berry of which is inspected and graded at the beneficios—coffee-drying stations—just as though they were so many diamonds. All native Costa Ricans are in coffee or in politics or related to Minor C. Keith. The volume of coffee production has remained more or less stationary for nearly half a century. Politics is a closed-shop industry with very little provision for apprentices. Everything else was started by Mr. Keith or by the successor to part of his undertakings—the United Fruit Co.

Mr. Keith is the ranking American citizen of Central America. He is now past 80 and lives in New York, but he is more active now throughout nearly every section of Central America than he was almost 60 years ago, when he found himself with a contract to build a narrow-gauge railroad from the sea to the top of the mountains. Several contractors had already failed, and the Republic had no money. So Keith's concession was hardly wrung from a cringing government—it gave the young man a good chance to close his career at its start.

Gathering together a crew of assorted beach combers and importing some shiploads of darkies from the Mississippi levees, he built the road, finding the money in England as he went along—for in those days the United States was a borrowing and not, as to-day, a lending Nation. Later Keith took another contract by which he filled up and drained Port Limon, thereby executing the first bit of sanitation ever done in the American Tropics. Still later the Government, with some aid from Keith, built the railway down the other side of the mountains to Puntarenas on the Pacific.

Thus it came to pass that Costa Rica was the first of all the Central American countries to have a railway from its capital to the sea and, until lately, the only one to have a railway connection with both oceans. Also, it was the first to come into direct contact with American enterprise, for Keith began to plant bananas along the Caribbean to make business for the railroad, and he persuaded others to plant. Then he organized a company to handle these bananas, and finally this company became a part of the United Fruit Co. In these once worthless malarial swamps the company has invested about $10,000,000 in railway spurs, drainage canals, houses, hospitals, and offices, and each year pays out about $7,000,000 in wages, in buying bananas from local planters, in railway freight charges and in taxes. The former income of this section was exactly nothing, while the income on the Pacific side of the railroad, where American enterprise has not penetrated, is still almost nothing.

Apparently nothing of much consequence has been done in Costa Rica except by Americans for nearly half a century, and since Americans have been in Costa Rica longer than they have in any of the other countries of Central America, I thought that the President ought to know a good deal about American imperialism, and especially since in San Jose almost every family of prominence has American connections by marriage.

The presidential palace in San Jose is not palatial. It is a one-story frame building facing the national park, which is away from the center of town. A policeman let me into a plain, wooden hall, from which opened several offices, showing odds and ends of desks and a few ancient but not antique red plush chairs. In a moment or two Don Ricardo Jiménez Oreamuno—he is known as Don Ricardo Jiménez—entered. He looks what he is—a perfectly independent man. He was President once before, from 1910 to 1914, and had no desire to be President again. But in 1924 he was more or less forced into the job to avoid a party split, and he is being President in exactly his own way—his political future is behind him. He is the best lawyer of the country, but he is not a rich man, because in his practice he has always set his fees according to what he thought his services were worth, not according to his client's pocketbook. This is more unusual than not becoming rich by being President.

"The foreign capital invested in this country," he said, speaking English slowly but well, "has been of great benefit. American capital, some of our people feared, might lead to intervention and imperialism, but it has not. It has been invested in the country and given employment to our people, and in every way the country has benefited from its being here.

"There are no American concessions or monopolies, and as long as I have known the affairs of my country, which is a very long time, Americans have never mixed in politics or had candidates or sought to influence elections or attempted to exercise any influence outside of their own business affairs. They have stood up for their rights, but they have asked no favors. They have received no favors, but I hope they have had their rights.

"Not long ago we borrowed $8,000,000 through American bankers, and of this nearly six millions were used to retire internal loans at a high rate of interest. This loan was opposed but not intelligently. It represented a sensible refunding of our obligations and has saved us a great deal of money as well as released capital for home purposes, and this has stimulated business. Also, we have had the additional capital to build roads. Only a small part of our country is as yet developed. We could support many times our present population, but we can not do this until we can build automobile roads, and for this we shall need still more money.

"Whatever imperialism may be, it is not here. We do not know it, and we never expect to know it."

II

Honduras is twice as big as Costa Rica, being slightly larger than Pennsylvania, and it is supposed to have about three-quarters of a million people, according to the last very sketchy census; but while in Costa Rica nearly the whole population is concentrated in a small, highly cultivated area, and the rest of the country is hardly more than explored, the people of Honduras are scattered over the mountains and valleys from the Caribbean to the Pacific, with the greatest concentration in the fruit regions of the Caribbean. Once one has left these fruit territories with their railroads, the mule becomes the only sure method of getting anywhere. The strength of a government depends upon its ability to enforce law and order, and this in turn depends upon its ability rapidly to concentrate its forces, and without roads this is impossible.

Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, is away off in the mountains, and until an American company put in a radio station it did not have even decent telegraphic communication with the rest of the country. The jefe politicos, if they control the comandantes of their districts, as they invariably do, can act about as they please, and revolutions are a matter of expediency rather than opportunity.

Tegucigalpa itself is a sprawling little city without any particular reason for existence except to be the country's capital. It has almost no business or trade and is utterly isolated. It is even harder to get out of it to the Caribbean than it is to get into it from the Pacific, for, while the road up from San Lorenzo is bad enough in any weather, still it may be used by automobiles even in the rainy season, if one keeps a sharp watch for slides and washouts. But the road north, although another good piece of engineering as far as Lake Yojoa, is not kept up, and so in bad weather only a mule can get through. The difficulty with nearly all Latin American improvements is that small provision is ever made for upkeep. From the lake to the head of the railway line the road is almost impassable, unless the weather be very dry.

The head of the railroad marks the beginning of the Americanized territory. There is one large American mining company, the Rosario, in the interior, but outside of small cattle ranches and some desultory coffee growing there is nothing in Honduras excepting the strip about 30 miles wide along the Caribbean coast, where three American fruit companies operate in bananas and sugar. Even lumbering does not pay well enough to make it worth anyone's while seriously to bother with it. Practically the whole income of the country is derived from the American capital invested on the Caribbean.

This section is a different world. It has railways, electric lights, sanitation, hospitals, modern piers, and steamship services. The total investment of the several companies is in excess of $40,000,000, and they annually pay in wages, taxes, and fruit purchases at least $10,000,000. Their customhouses are the sources of the country's big revenues, and so an astute revolutionist begins by seizing one of these ports and trying to collect the customs; and with the seat of government so far away, he can, if he has the cooperation of the local comandante, hang onto a customhouse for a couple of weeks and finance himself very nicely out of the proceeds.

The strength of any government in Honduras depends upon the strength of the general who stands behind it. The strength of the present government is General Carias, who is nearly a full-blooded Indian. He is the leader of the National Party and led the revolution of 1924 against the Liberals, who held Tegucigalpa. Instead of making himself President, he was content with being president of Congress and also president of the permanent committee, which functions when Congress is in recess; it actually has more to do with running the country than has Congress, and it can even depose the President. General Carias is dictator in fact although not in name, but unlike most dictators he seems to dislike showing his authority. He lives in the mountains about 20 miles from the capital in an unpretentious little one-story place, with a roadside store in front. He mounts his horse and rides into the capital only when he is needed.

Dr. Miguel Paz, the President, is a country doctor and never had been in politics before his election. He began his medical education in Guatemala, then he studied in London and Paris and finally in New York, but he is in no sense a cosmopolite, nor is he a politician. His real interest is medicine, and he gives the impression of not being very comfortable as President. The main thing on the President's mind was roads.

"We must have both railroads and automobile roads," he said. "Our people are very poor, because in the interior it costs so much to move goods. We could be raising cattle on a larger scale, we could be lumbering, we could be doing many things if only we had more roads. Then the whole country could be opened up in the same way that the north coast has been opened up by the Americans.

"American capital has been of great benefit to us. It is responsible for nearly all the business of the country. We want more, not less, American capital, and we shall do everything we can to make investment safe and profitable."

"Have the American companies or has the American Government done anything that could be classed as imperialistic? Have they interfered in any way with your own sovereignty?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "in no way. No American company has ever been in politics, and the few Americans who have ever taken an active part in our political affairs were acting for themselves—they were 'soldiers of fortune.' They were members of our own parties and did not represent foreign interests. Whenever your Government has landed marines it has been for the purpose of protecting property from useless destruction. We are not interfered with in any way, and I feel that the presence of the United States and the Monroe doctrine, far from being a menace, constitute our greatest protection."

III

The wildest stories of American imperialism center around Nicaragua because our marines have frequently landed there. I read in one socialistic publication that American bankers had earned, or rather taken, $39,000,000 in profits out of this Republic, which impressed me as something of an achievement. After looking Nicaragua over, I discovered that the taking of such an amount would not be an achievement at all, but a miracle!

The first floor of the presidential palace was American and military. The second floor was Nicaraguan and nonmilitary. A big waiting room was filled with orderly rows of the large bent-wood rocking chairs, without which no Central American home is complete, and every chair held a fat, barefooted peasant woman, who had come hunting for news of husband or sons, and would never find any because no one ever knows who is in the army.

President Diaz was in another large room, likewise filled with chairs; but he was alone. He did not look at all like a man whose life outside that cordon of marines would have been worth next to nothing. Neither did he look like a man who had been shot at many times and who once before had sat in this same room supported by the forces of the United States. On the contrary, he seemed to be a very quiet, peaceful man, with a pleasant but not at all strong face. His friends like him intensely and his enemies hate him intensely, but there is nothing about him to show why. His manner is exceedingly quiet, although not reserved. Ever since he first came into office as Vice President in 1910 on the overthrow of the dictator Zelaya, he has advocated an American protectorate as the best way out for Nicaragua.

"The only solution that will insure peace for Nicaragua," he told me, "is an arrangement such as you have for Cuba under the Platt amendment, which gives you the right to intervene in the case of revolution and also gives a certain supervision over finances.

"I proposed this when I was President before. I think it would be welcomed by all of my countrymen who have the interests of their country at heart, for it is the only method that will overcome the habit of revolution. We had no revolutions while the legation guard was here, but that was an unofficial arrangement. I think that an official arrangement by which revolution could be made impossible would bring American money into this country and let us develop our resources.

"Our two parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, hold to exactly the same principles, and our revolutions are concerned not with principles but only with personalities.

"All Nicaraguans are friends of the United States. There is no real anti-American sentiment, but a great deal has been manufactured by Mexico. This revolution was purely of Mexican origin, and our people when in revolution will take aid from anywhere. The Liberals know as well as I know that it is to the United States and not to Mexico that Nicaragua must look.

"We have not enough American money in Nicaragua. If we could have secured the loan in 1911 to build a railroad across the country the revolutionary habit would by this time have died. As it is, we are separated from the Caribbean by mountains and jungles and have had no opportunity to become a unified country.

"We are now just where we were 16 years ago, and it is a question of building up all over again. If the United States would build the canal, that would benefit everybody, but we can become a rich country without the canal, if only we can get the railroad. There has never been any American imperialism in Nicaragua. It is simply that we have been saved from the worst consequences of our purely sectional wars."

IV

Little Salvador has lost the habit of revolution. It is only a tiny country of seven thousand odd square miles, literally hanging on the shores of the Pacific, but it has more than a million and a half people, and is thus of the Central American Republics second in point of population to Guatemala, which has about 2,000,000 people, but is nearly seven times as large.

Salvador, like Switzerland, has made the most of its mountains, and with fewer natural advantages than any other Central American Republics has forced its way ahead through coffee growing. The chief barrier to progress in all of these countries is revolution, and Salvador has not had a revolution since 1898. One of the principal reasons is that Minor Keith built a railroad practically the length of the country. Thus troops may be mobilized anywhere within a day. This means that they do not have to be mobilized and the people can use the railroad to transport their products through all seasons of the year. Now the railroad is being continued to join the Guatemalan section of the International Railways of Central America, so that within six months it will be possible for Salvador to ship its goods out of Puerto Barrios, the Caribbean port of Guatemala, and take advantage of its frequent services.

The completion of the connecting link of the railroad will mark the first joining of two Central American countries by railroad. It seems remarkable, but the only convenient way of getting from one Central American country to another is by going to the coast and taking a ship. Otherwise one must go by mule back through the jungle. This is the real reason why no union of Central American Republics has ever lasted. There can be no union until they have established communication with one another.

Salvador has an American loan. It is the only loan of consequence in Central America. One might imagine from listening to the American anti-imperialists that one could not swing a cat anywhere in Central America without hitting a rapacious banker. Actually, all these countries are trying to get money. They show a surprising desire to become the victims of American imperialism. The Salvadorian loan was made in 1922, principally because the English loan was in default. It is a consolidated loan, under which an American fiscal representative, W. W. Renwick, collects 70 per cent of all the imports and exports. Salvador liked his work so well that he now collects all the customs, including their own 30 per cent.

The loan was partly a consolidation but also gave some new money. The new money was mostly spent, under supervision, in providing the city of San Salvador with modern municipal improvements. This work includes a water system, sewers, electric and telephone ducts, and street paving. San Salvador is the first really modernized Central American city outside of the Canal Zone. Now, out of the portion of the funds collected by the fiscal agent and practically out of money that before his régime never saw the light, a road program is being undertaken.

The one thing that all parties in Salvador seem to agree on is that the American loan has been a success, and this in spite of a quite considerable anti-American feeling that has been worked up, and also in spite of the fact that the customs receipts of the country are pledged. The rub in these arrangements, which not only pledge revenues but also have them collected by a foreigner, is that it involves a loss of sovereignty—which is true. But the situation has been so humanly handled by Mr. Renwick that no one seems to bother about the technical situation. The English bonds that were in default were a lien on the customs. It was the British who discovered that the customs were the only tangible assets on which to lend.

I saw the new President, Dr. Pio Romero Bosque, a few weeks after his inauguration and almost before he had a real introduction to his office. Seeing the President of Salvador involves more formality than seeing any other of the Central American Presidents. The Casa Presidencial is only a single-story building, but it is opposite the armory of the First Infantry Regiment, which is a pretentious structure taking in a whole city block. It is really a fort. Sentries patrol every side, and high up on each corner are steel cages with more sentries. The entry into the President's house is somewhat surprising, for one goes through a small door and pops most unexpectedly into a room completely lined with soldiers sitting bolt upright with their rifles, bayonets fixed, between their knees. It is just as though one dropped into an animated cutlery shop. The waiting room is along a small and very pretty court filled with flowers, and hanging at the end is a large painting of the signing of the Salvador declaration of independence in 1823.

"It is most important for us to continue to get roads and sanitation throughout the country as well as in San Salvador," said the President. "Our financial arrangements are working out so well and we should have the money as we need it without the necessity for borrowing more. And we are collecting taxes on capital that it was said we could not collect. The tax laws may have to be changed, but we shall, I am sure, be able to pay for all improvements out of revenues."

Knowing that he had the reputation of being a Mexican sympathizer, I asked him:

"What do you think Mexico has in mind with all its propaganda, most of which is against the United States?"

"Mexico is working for an ideal," he said, vaguely. And answering a further question he went on: "No; Mexico does not represent that ideal and is not living up to it, but they are trying to do something, and I do not believe that it is aimed against the United States, for that would be only foolish. There could be no war between the United States and Mexico. I can not conceive of such a war, but since you ask me what this country would do in such an event, I can say only that Salvador would remain strictly neutral.

"We have not had much experience in Salvador with American money, and I have heard of imperialism, but I can not say that I know exactly what it means. Your countrymen have built our largest railroad, they have done the improvement work here, they negotiated our loan, and our largest bank is owned by Americans. There are no American concessions in the sense of monopolies, and we have been asked for none. In fact, all of our relations with Americans have been very pleasant, and I can see no reason why they should not continue so. We need you more than you need us."

V

Gen. Lázaro Chacón, the President of Guatemala, is commonly termed "The Unknown Soldier," for until he became President at the death of Orellana last year, he had never been anything but a soldier. I talked with him in the Presidential Palace, which is an unpretentious one-story building facing the plaza and across from the barracks of the Guard of Honor that Chacón formerly commanded and where he still has his quarters. He does not speak English, but the chief of the protocol in the foreign office lived for years in New York and proved to be an ideal interpreter. I asked him if the capital that had come into his country from the United States had been a benefit or a hurt, and if he had detected signs of imperialism.

"The capital from the United States has been wholly a benefit," he answered. "It has raised wages on the coast to several times what are paid in the interior. We should welcome more capital and must look to the United States not only for it but also for guidance. I have never heard of imperialism in this country. In fact, I do not know of any American company having asked for or having received anything to which it was not justly entitled. There are no American monopolies, and we have been asked for none. All the best works we have are the result of American capital."

Next I talked with the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr. José Matos. I asked him about the extent of Mexican propaganda in his country.

"There is a great deal of Mexican propaganda," he answered. "It is very disturbing. We have had many raids on the border and also we have had to ask many Mexicans to leave. There is also a deal of bolshevist preaching, but this, I think, is not effective, for our people have no liking for socialism. We are doing our best to combat all of this, but you know that we must keep friendly with Mexico, for they are our neighbors, and with the long boundary their armies could cross anywhere and crush us. We hope that the United States would protect us, but you might be a long time taking action. And then where should we be?

"As I see the situation, you will some time take Nicaragua as a canal route. Costa Rica will then be only a State between two canals. This means that Honduras, Salvador, and Guatemala must unite on economic lines. The day of political union has passed. We must unite for our own development, and the money for that development must come from the United States. We need money for roads and water power. As for the United States being imperialistic, that is nonsense. I know your country too well."

General Orellana encouraged Minor Keith in the building of the railroad, which had been started years before, and now the road goes from Puerto Barrios on the Carribean right through to the Pacific, with a spur leading up toward Mexico, and another, as has been mentioned, on its way to make connection with Salvador. There have been no revolutions since this road went through, and it looks as though the habit were no more. But the road that represents an investment to date of upwards of $45,000,000 would not be a paying investment had not the United Fruit Co. reclaimed the wastes of the Caribbean and made banana plantations out of the wilderness at a cost of about $10,000,000 and installed its usual system of sanitation, hospitals, towns, and modern equipment.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, and I submit a report (No. 273) thereon.

I wish to state that I shall have a copy of the bill, together with the report, placed upon the desk of every Senator within the next 15 minutes. This is a very important piece of legislation and I want to call it up for consideration at the very first opportunity. Therefore, I ask that Senators may read the report, because it has been made quite full in explanation of every provision of the bill and every amendment thereto. I do not think it is going to take very long to pass the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, in order to save a little time, if there have been any considerable changes from the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SMOOT. There are quite a number of changes. There are the Austrian claims and Hungarian claims which are incorporated in the bill now. There are also some minor changes. The Senate committee agreed to the valuation to be placed upon the ships of $100,000,000, or not more than that amount. They also agreed to the amount of retained German property of 20 per cent, the same as the House provided. As to the other amendments in the bill, the report gives a detailed statement as to just why the amendments are made and what effect they have.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does it give a list of the claimants?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it gives the amount of the claims, but not the list. That is in the office of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to say that following the passage or defeat of the pending resolution he proposed to make a motion to take up the Muscle Shoals bill. Does the Senator from Utah propose to wait until after the Muscle Shoals bill shall have been disposed of before he moves to take up the alien property bill, or what is the understanding with reference to it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I took it for granted that the statement of the Senator from Nebraska referred to by the Senator from Mississippi was merely an announcement of the intention of the Senator from Nebraska. I have just stated to the Senate that I desire to take up the alien property bill at the first opportunity. The committee which considered the bill was virtually unanimous in reporting it, and I do not think debate and disposition of the bill will take very long.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator that it ought not to take very long to pass the alien property bill, and it should be taken up as soon as possible so that it may be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. It is my intention to get the bill before the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what does the Senator from Utah mean by his statement that the report of the committee on the alien property bill is virtually unanimous?

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the fact that there are one or two items in the bill as to which members of the committee reserve the right to offer amendments on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There are items that are contested, but there is no minority report?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no minority report on the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as a member of the Finance Committee I desire to say that there are some features of the bill which do not meet my approval and there are some amendments which I shall desire to tender, but in the main I subscribed to the report simply because we had to do so. The bill deals with an important subject; we have got to dispose of it, and compromises of a very important character have to be made in order to secure any legislation covering the questions involved.

ASSISTANT PRINTING CLERK

Mr. DENEEN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 140), submitted by Mr. WATSON on the 6th instant, providing for the employment of an assistant printing clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, reported it without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois desire the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DENEEN. No; I am not making that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC UTILITY CORPORATIONS

Mr. DENEEN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 83), submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on December 17, 1927, authorizing an investigation of public utility corporations, reported it with an additional amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 83), as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Senate Resolution 83, Report No. 225

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 17, 1927.

Mr. WALSH of Montana submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie over under the rule. December 19, 1927, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. February 1 (calendar day, February 2), 1928, reported by Mr. WATSON, with amendments. February 6, 1928, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Resolution

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate be appointed by the President thereof, and be hereby empowered and directed to inquire into and report upon: (1) The growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public utility corporations operating in different States, and of nonpublic utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named, the holding companies, and the public utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to such public utility corporations by such holding companies and/or their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of such holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or to influence or control elections: Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives.

That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper, and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation, which shall not exceed $30,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will change my request and ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at the close of morning business on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I inquire if the consideration of the resolution will lead to any extended debate?

Mr. WATSON. I think it will, I will say to the Senator. I think there will be quite a lengthy debate on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wanted not later than Monday to call up the alien property bill for consideration. I do not think it is going to take very long to pass the bill. It ought to be passed so that it may go to conference at the earliest day possible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us say, then, that the consideration of the resolution is not to interfere with the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. DILL. May we have an understanding that there will be no vote on Monday?

Mr. WATSON. On what?

Mr. DILL. On the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think that a unanimous-consent agreement of that kind could be reached, because nobody knows how long the debate will last.

Mr. DILL. There are a number of Senators who will not be here on Monday; I am one of them; and I hope we can have such an understanding as I have indicated.

Mr. WATSON. A number of Senators will be absent from the city speaking on Lincoln's birthday, which occurs on Sunday, February 12, but the celebration of which will come on Monday, the 13th. It might be entirely agreeable that no vote be taken on Monday, but I think the resolution ought to be taken up for discussion on Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I apprehend there will be no difficulty about the matter of a vote on Monday. The Senator from Montana himself probably would not desire a vote on Monday or Tuesday. Until that time Senators who want to be present when the vote is taken will be absent, but I do think that the consideration of the resolution should be proceeded with on Monday.

Mr. WATSON. Subject to the alien property bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 83, which has been read, be considered on Monday.

Mr. WATSON. Subject to the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire at what time on Monday?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say at the conclusion of the morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the conclusion of the morning business, subject to the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, then that does not mean that we are to vote on Monday?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. WATSON. No; that is not the meaning.

Mr. SIMMONS. But merely that the resolution shall be taken up at that time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That it will be taken up subsequent to the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. At what time on Monday—after the conclusion of the morning business?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does that mean, if the alien property bill takes all day Monday, that the unanimous consent agreement will have no application or that the resolution of the Senator from Montana will be taken up on Tuesday?

Mr. WATSON. That it will be taken up immediately on the conclusion of the alien property bill, as I understand.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. On whatever day the alien property bill shall have been disposed of?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it would be well to have the unanimous-consent agreement so state.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Chair, in putting the request for unanimous consent, stated that it would be subject to the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. President, ought not the unanimous-consent agreement provide that the alien property bill shall be taken up at 2 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood from the Senator from Utah that he might not be prepared to take up the bill at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I shall certainly be prepared at that time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. I will modify my request for unanimous consent so as to provide that the resolution shall be taken up for consideration after the disposition of the alien property bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Which bill shall be taken up not later than 2 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I shall be successful in bringing up the Muscle Shoals bill, perhaps it will be out of the way by that time; but I should dislike to get part way through with it and then come in conflict with a unanimous-consent agreement which would cause it to be laid aside and provide that some other measure shall be taken up. That, I think, is not the way in which to expedite business—to get part way through with one bill and then take up another bill.

Mr. SMOOT. May I say to the Senator that I should like very much to take up the bill on Saturday.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to taking it up, if it may be understood that it will come up at the conclusion of the consideration of the Muscle Shoals bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know when that will be.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not say, either; I wish I could. It may be that it will only take a day; I do not think it will take very long.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not agree to that.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is any urgent reason, Mr. President, why the alien property bill should be considered immediately, I am willing that it should come up this afternoon or to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. In my opening statement I said that I also filed a report on the bill. It is a very difficult bill to read and understand. The committee have been very particular in framing the report to discuss every question involved.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I am interested in this discussion because I have a bill in charge which I desire to have considered.

Mr. SMOOT. In the report the questions involved in the bill are explained in detail; the report is a long one, and I am afraid it would not expedite the passage of the bill to bring it up to-day. The report on the bill is now found upon the desks of Senators, and I have asked them to read the bill and the report. I know if they will do so it will hasten the passage of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to interfere with any proper disposition of the business of the Senate. We do not have to take up the Muscle Shoals bill to-day or to-morrow. If there is anything about the alien property bill that makes it particularly urgent to take action upon it at once, I am willing to let that bill come up and be disposed of before we take up the Muscle Shoals measure; but I should not like to start in on the Muscle Shoals bill and get halfway through and then be compelled to lay it aside to take up some other important measure that will probably occupy a day or several days of the Senate's time.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYSON. I wish to say, Mr. President, that there is a bill on the calendar, being Order of Business No. 116, Senate bill 777, which, in my opinion, is a very important measure. It has been reported to the Senate, and a similar measure has been before the Senate for several years. I should object to any bill being considered until I can secure some arrangement as to when the bill to which I have referred may be brought up and considered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let us see if we can not agree that the resolution be taken up at the close of the morning business on Monday. That would give us the morning hour. We can consider the matter at least until the hour of 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the Senator suggests that the resolution be considered immediately following the routine morning business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Immediately following the routine morning business on Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that. Then, at 2 o'clock we can take up the alien property bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the resolution be taken up at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That will cut out the consideration of the calendar on Monday. Why not provide that the resolution shall be considered after the routine morning business on Tuesday?

Mr. MOSES. We called the whole calendar two days ago, Mr. President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But there have been many bills placed on the calendar since that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to propose to the resolution. I should like to offer it at this time and have it lie on the table and be considered pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. TYSON. Do I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement as proposed merely provides for the bringing up of the resolution of the Senator from Montana, without anything further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. TYSON. So that no other measure will be brought up under the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. The agreement provides that the resolution shall be considered immediately after the routine morning business on Monday.

Mr. TYSON. That does not give the bill reported by the Senator from Utah or any other bill any preference afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. The request as now submitted does not give any other bill a preference.

Mr. TYSON. I wanted to understand the proposed agreement in its present form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Monday, February 13, 1928, at the conclusion of the morning business the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 83) authorizing an investigation of public-utility corporations.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

HENRY W. KEYES,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
FRITZ G. LANHAM,
J. WILL TAYLOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator what the points of agreement were.

Mr. WARREN. There are, finally, no disagreements, and the bill is exactly as we passed it. After the first meeting the House and Senate conferees concluded that the amendments which had been offered were unnecessary, understanding from the Architect of the Treasury that such was the case, and they agree now to strike them out; so the bill is lying on the desk as it was printed and as it passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA COAL FIELDS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in the course of a debate that occurred in the Senate on the 1st day of February I voiced my opposition to a bill sponsored by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], which provides that in certain contingencies a Federal commission shall seize and operate the coal mines of the country.

A number of newspapers that are widely circulated in West Virginia have erroneously construed my assertion of opposition to the Copeland bill as a declaration of war against the Johnson resolution, which proposes a senatorial investigation of the conditions in the coal fields of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia.

To the best of my information there is neither a West Virginia coal operator nor a West Virginia coal miner who is opposed to the Johnson resolution.

On the day the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] so ably and eloquently discussed this measure in the Senate I voluntarily informed him that I intended to support it. The intention thus communicated I shall translate into appropriate action at the earliest opportunity by voting for the Johnson resolution.

This statement is made for the purpose of having my attitude toward this important measure accurately recorded.

LOAN OF COTS, BLANKETS, ETC.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the other morning the Senator from Arkansas asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which had passed the House by unanimous vote. I asked that the measure be sent to the committee, because I think that is the best course to pursue. I have no objection to the bill; and, as it is important that it shall pass soon, I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 7013, and that it be returned to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and myself, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 7013) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to lend, at his discretion, to the entertainment committee of the United Confederate Veterans, whose encampment is to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in the month of May, 1928, 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the chairman of said entertainment committee, Mr. E. R. Wiles: Provided further, That the Secretary of War before delivering said property shall take from said E. R. Wiles a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RADIO REGULATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I present a letter, in the nature of a petition, relating to the radio matter. I should like to have it included at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., February 7, 1928.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COPELAND: In the belief that insurgent interests have had most to say in connection with the present hearings regarding the continuance of the Federal Radio Commission and its personnel—usually those opposed to anything are quick to anger, those favorable content to remain silently acquiescent—I think that in all fairness that the experiences of this station, WLTH, and the writer, its owner and president, should be made part of the record; and to that end it is my duty as well as my pleasure to give this public expression of my belief in the integrity, fair-mindedness, and efficiency of the commission, and also my conviction that it has made material progress in an admittedly difficult situation.

It was my desire to give these impressions in the form of verbal testimony and for such reason made a trip to Washington. I found, to my great regret, that the Interstate Commerce Committee's time was so limited that there was no opportunity for me to take the stand, especially as the president of the National Broadcasting Co., a most important witness, had been called at the meetings Monday as well as Saturday.

Therefore, I am taking the liberty of addressing these words to you and trust that you will forward them through the proper channels, that WLTH's attitude may be understood.

This station was formerly known as WFRL. It broadcast on 218 meters under those call letters. In the summer of 1927 it was able to effectuate plans for expansion, and these were laid before the commission in its regular order of business. The appeal of this broadcaster for a high wave length was recognized, after a legal hearing, and after the case had been analyzed the commission agreed that the application was warranted.

It is not because that our petition was granted that this communication is being sent for your information. What WLTH desires to emphasize is that on this occasion and all others the commission sought to get at all the facts in an open and thorough way, with justice to all affected, which was done with due promptness and courtesy. The commission has sought to cooperate. It has never aimed to bulldoze, to placate, or discriminate; and that is the view of the others within the radio field with whom WLTH has been in touch.

It is therefore pleasing to note that the proposal to extend the life of the commission has met with approval and that the members so far unconfirmed by the Senate have been given a favorable recommendation by the committee.

This action, we firmly conclude, is in the public interest, insuring a continued series of conferences between the board and the stations that will result in a solution of the obvious troubles that still remain.

Thanking you for your interest in the broadcasting situation and with assurance of high regard, I am,

Respectfully yours,

S. J. GELLARD,
President WLTH,
"The Voice of Brooklyn."

P. S.—This station will give its assistance to every worthy civic and charitable cause and fulfill all those functions necessary in the public interest which comprise the foundation stones of broadcasting. As you undoubtedly know, WLTH's microphone has been open to these organizations from the inception of the station, and in carrying qut this policy we trust to keep on going far beyond the strict letter of the radio statutes.

REGULATION OF TRANSPORTATION RATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 10, submitted by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas on the 8th instant, as follows:

Whereas the Congress has been memorialized by State legislatures and by citizens to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission has attempted so to regulate rates of transportation as to equalize prosperity among producers of commodities and to the end has employed rate regulation to place an embargo upon the products of certain States and in order to favor the products of other States as to certain markets;

Whereas these memorials and petitions indicate the assumption of a power not vested in the commission and a discretion which the Congress can neither exercise nor confer; and

Whereas it is advisable that the Senate should have full and complete information concerning the subject complained of: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested, and is hereby instructed to transmit to the Congress on or before the 15th day of April, 1928, the following information, to wit: (a) Copies of all decisions handed down by it in the five years preceding the 1st day of April, 1928, in which its decisions as to the reasonableness of any rate or rates were in any sense influenced by the competitive advantage or disadvantage of the producers in one State, district, or section as compared with the advantage or disadvantage of the producers in another State, district, or section; (b) a full and complete citation of the section or sections of the interstate commerce act as amended, and other acts, under which the commission claims and believes it was granted the power to equalize prosperity among the producers of commodities; and a statement of the clause or clauses, articles, or amendments of the Constitution under which it claims and believes that decisions of such a character and purport were authorized or were implied.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this does not call for anything that is not already printed except what is covered by the statement in the last clause?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My interpretation of the resolution is that it merely calls for the decisions which are alleged to have been made, using the rate regulation power for the control or influencing of industry.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, addressing myself to the Senator from Arkansas, certain of those requests go upon the assumption that the commission has rendered decisions of that character, do they not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to modifying the resolution so as to read "copies of all decisions, if any."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think that would cover the point I have in mind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask leave to modify the resolution, in line 5, after the word "decisions," to insert the words "if any," so that it will read "copies of all decisions, if any, handed down," and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the modification will be made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas permit a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am very much in sympathy with the purpose and object of the resolution. In my State we feel that in the fixing of the transportation charges, on citrous fruits, as an illustration, the commission has been influenced by such a policy as that concerning which we are asked to make an inquiry. Would this reach a situation of that kind; in other words, where rates were fixed for a haul of 3,000 miles practically the same as for a haul of 1,200 miles? Would it reach a situation of that kind?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This resolution does not attempt to define any policy for the Interstate Commerce Commission. It does seek to get information from the commission itself as to whether such a policy has met with approval in the decisions of the commission.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I heartily agree with the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to discuss this resolution. I am very much concerned about the securing of the information called for by the resolution, because in my judgment the Interstate Commerce Commission has rendered decisions not based upon the justice or reasonableness of freight rates, per se, but has rendered decisions in order that business might be diverted from one section of the country to another.

When the interstate commerce act was first passed, in 1887, the main object was to provide a commission under the commerce clause of the Constitution that would protect the people from exorbitant and unjust freight rates and would also give the people a tribunal before which they might appear for the purpose of preventing unfair discrimination as between individual shippers, and prevent the granting of preferences to one shipper who was the competitor of another.

Under the sections of the interstate commerce act prior to the taking over the railroads as a war measure the only function of the commission in deciding upon rates was to determine whether they were just and reasonable. They had a right also to pass on whether a given rate was unjustly discriminatory or preferential as between shippers.

When the war came the railroads were taken over by the Government as a war measure, and the railroad systems of the country were somewhat unified, and we all learned some lessons in the control and operation of railroads by reason of our experience during the war.

When Congress was charged with the duty of returning the railroads to their owners it became necessary to enact new legislation. The House of Representatives passed what was then known as the Esch bill. It came over to the Senate, and the Senate struck out all the language of the bill which passed the House and inserted the Cummins bill, and the two Houses, through their conferees, thereafter worked out a measure now known as the transportation act, which has been in force since 1920.

The Senator from Arkansas, Mr. ROBINSON; the Senator from Washington, Mr. Poindexter; the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Kellogg; the Senator from Iowa, Mr. Cummins; and the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Pomerene, were the Senate conferees in working out the differences between the two Houses on the transportation act.

Congressmen Winslow, of Massachusetts; Hamilton, of Michigan; Esch, of Wisconsin, now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission; Sims, of Tennessee; and myself comprised the House conferees on that legislation. The Senator from Arkansas and I are the only Members in either branch of Congress now who were on that conference committee. We worked for six weeks or more in undertaking to adjust the differences between the two Houses. I was unable to support the conference report, partly on account of some of the provisions of section 15a.

In the bill which passed the House of Representatives there was nowhere any power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to set itself up as a judge as between different sections of our country, to bring prosperity to one section and adversity to another through the means of the adjustment of freight rates. In the bill which passed the Senate, known as the Cummins bill, there was no such provision and no such authority granted.

After working on the compromise measure for six weeks it was brought into both the Senate and the House within a week of the adjournment of Congress. The President of the United States had already provided that on the 31st day of March, whether Congress passed any legislation or not, the railroads were to be returned to private ownership, and as the Congress was to adjourn on the 4th day of March both Houses were confronted with the situation where they were required to vote upon the so-called Esch-Cummins law, or the transportation act, as it was presented to both Houses, or run the risk of having no new legislation at all on the subject of railroad rates or railroad operation.

In the report of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I happened to be a member, there was nowhere any mention of any provision, nor the suggestion of any authority, that would give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to set itself up as a judge as between the sections of our country in matters of commerce and prosperity.

In the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, prepared by Senator Cummins on the bill which was passed by the Senate as a substitute for the bill which passed the House, there was nowhere any suggestion of any such power that ought to be granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the report of the conference committee, made late in February, within a week of the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, there was nowhere any discussion or suggestion of any such power to be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the transportation act itself, section 15a, which has been a matter of universal discussion throughout the country since its enactment, there is this provision, subsection 2 of section 15a:

> In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates—

And up until this time justness and reasonableness had been the standard of rate fixing by the commission since its creation—

> In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the commission shall initiate, modify, establish, or adjust such rates so that carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate) will, under honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance of way, structures, and equipment, earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation: Provided, That the commission shall have reasonable latitude to modify or adjust any particular rate which it may find to be unjust or unreasonable, and to prescribe different rates for different sections of the country.

Section 15a was intended to give congressional direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission that in determining the justness and reasonableness of any rate it was authorized to fix a standard of rates for the whole country high enough to guarantee to the railroads a fair return upon the value of the property used for the purposes of transportation.

This last proviso was a mere incidental power conferred upon the commission in order to aid it in carrying out the general provisions of that subsection, to wit, the power to make rates that would bring to the railroads a fair return on the value of their property.

That provision of section 15a was never intended by either the House or the Senate, or by either the House or the Senate committees, or by the conferees of the House or the Senate, to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the broad power to change rates, or to initiate rates, or to deny rates, based upon the proposition that the granting or the denial of such rates would be an advantage in favor of one section of country and a disadvantage with respect to some other section of our country.

Mr. KING and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Utah first, and then I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator propose some amendment to the existing law which will curb the Interstate Commerce Commission or restrain them in the exercise of discretion which becomes a discrimination, as I understand the Senator, in favor of one section as against another, or which will justify them in their course in determining that they will fix the rates in order to advance the prosperity of one section which they believe to be under a cloud of depression?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not offered any amendment to the existing transportation act. I am speaking upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] calling upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to furnish the Senate with information regarding decisions of this character. But I will say to the Senator that if this tendency of the commission upon which it has embarked is to be continued, I shall certainly offer an amendment to the interstate commerce act which will make it impossible for the commission to set itself up as a judge as between sections of our country, with power to decide that one section shall be prosperous and another shall undergo adversity by reason of freight-rate maneuvers.

Mr. KING. Of course, I might say to the Senator that there is a general feeling in the intermountain region that, whether purposely or otherwise, that section has been discriminated against under the construction of the long-and-short-haul provisions of the transportation act, as the result of which our freight rates have been unduly advanced and freight rates to the Pacific coast, to our disadvantage, if they have not been lowered, have been put at such a standard that it is in effect discrimination against the intermountain section of the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am familiar with the contention of the intermountain section of the country with reference to the matter, and I have considerable sympathy for some of your problems.

I yield now to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To appreciate the full force of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, is it argued that the commission has in any of its decisions exercised the power claimed to be granted to it to fix rates with the purpose of equalizing the prosperity of different sections?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. I will say to the Senator from California that it is not only claimed, but it is insisted upon. In recent decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission that very question has not only been discussed by the commission, but the preponderance of evidence introduced before the commission had to do with the economic situation in one section of the country as compared with the economic situation in another section of the country, and in its decision, rendered subsequently, the commission attempted to adjust that economic condition by a readjustment of freight rates.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That prompts me to request the Senator to be good enough to refer us to the particular case or ruling wherein that power was claimed and exercised.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the Lake Cargo cases decided in May, 1927, the claim was made that that was the compelling motive of the commission in providing for a reduction of freight rates from the State of Pennsylvania to ports on the Great Lakes, where coal is transferred from trains to boats and shipped across the Great Lakes to consuming districts in the Northwest. In that very decision Commissioner Hall, who has retired from the commission, dissented from the majority opinion because he contended that the commission had no such power as it assumed. He had written two years prior to that the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission denying this very action on the part of the commission. Two years later its views, by reason of the fact that two commissioners changed their attitude, were reversed, and this same Commissioner Hall, who had written the previous opinion, wrote a very strong dissenting opinion in the latter decision, in which he charged that there was no transportation reason for a reduction of freight rates applying to one section of the country, and charged that the commission had undertaken to do a thing that Congress had not empowered it to do, to wit, regulate or adjust economic and industrial conditions that were wholly different and due to different circumstances in two sections of the country affected by the decision.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator from Kentucky claim, as matter of law, that the commission has no power under the law to take into consideration that matter? In other words, does the law in express terms, properly interpreted, give to the commission authority or power to consider the subject matter affecting the prosperity or industries of different sections?

Mr. BARKLEY. The law gives the commission power to consider freight rates upon the reasonableness and justness of the rate within itself or to determine whether a rate is unduly prejudicial or discriminatory as between different shippers and different sections; but that is a power which is incidental to the power granted in section 15a that charges the commission with the duty of fixing and adjusting rates over the whole country that will bring to the railroads a fair return. It is not a primary power, but an incidental power.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not asking these questions as indicating opposition to the Senator's views. If they are exercising this power to the disadvantage of a given section, and if the law authorizes them to do this, then we ought to consider the amending of the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said a moment ago that we should ascertain if the tendency to which I have referred is to be continued and adopted as a policy of the commission, which I think is wholly unauthorized, because the power given to the commission with reference to taking into consideration the economic or labor or industrial conditions in different sections of the country is for the purpose of preventing transportation discrimination or transportation prejudices for or against different sections of the country and was never intended to give the commission the power to fix the freight rates based upon whether one section of the country ought to be and another section ought not to be prosperous.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then if the power is there, which may be abused, the law ought to be amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator. In the formation of the Constitution and in the adoption of the commerce clause of the Constitution it was felt incumbent upon the Constitutional Convention to provide against the possibility of one section of our country erecting barriers against another section in the matter of its commerce. Therefore it provided in effect that no State shall have the power to tax exports or imports coming from or going to another State, and that only Congress itself shall have the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign countries. I think that was a wise provision of the Constitution. Yet we have set up a commission, under the authority of the commerce clause of the Constitution, which is doing the very thing against which the Constitutional Convention provided, by declaring, through the manipulation of freight rates, that it has the power, for instance, to say that the coal operators in the State of Pennsylvania, through a reduction of 20 cents per ton on coal shipments to the lake ports, shall be allowed that advantage in an effort to overcome economic and industrial conditions over which the commission has no power and thereby deprive other coal-producing sections of the country of the opportunity to market their coal along the lake ports for the benefit not only of operators and industrial conditions in the southern territory but in order to give the industrial life of the Northwest—Michigan, Wisconsin, the Dakotas, Iowa, and other Northwestern States—the opportunity to go into the open market under equitable conditions and buy their coal wherever they desire to buy without having a commission here in Washington in effect saying to them that they shall be denied that equal opportunity because they propose to reduce the freight rates in one section of the country and inform railroads in other sections of the country that they will not be permitted to reduce their rates in the same way.

Mr. BLAINE and Mr. BRUCE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. And through that same manipulation of rates place an economic loss upon the consumers of coal in the Northwest of about $5,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. I think the Senator has fixed the amount very conservatively at $5,000,000. There is no way to fix the actual loss sustained by the industrial life of the Northwest through this situation.

Mr. BLAINE. The Northwest is paying $5,000,000 in added freight rates.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. That is an economic loss to the users.

Mr. BARKLEY. And by the time we multiply this increase in actual freight rates to the consumer there is hardly any way to estimate how much the actual loss will be.

I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Let me ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he has not overlooked the effect of the Senate joint resolution commonly known as the Hoch-Smith resolution, which was approved January 30, 1925? That resolution provides:

> That the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structure of common carriers subject to the interstate commerce act, in order to determine to what extent and in what manner existing rates and charges may be unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential, thereby imposing undue burdens or giving undue advantage as between the various localities and parts of the country, the various classes of traffic, and the various classes and kinds of commodities, and to make, in accordance with law, such changes, adjustments, and redistribution of rates and charges as may be found necessary to correct any defects so found to exist.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. BRUCE. Whether the Senator has not overlooked, in criticizing, as he has done, the recent decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the effect of that joint resolution to which I have just referred? Now, so far as that act proposes to give the Interstate Commerce Commission a certain amount of leeway in giving the great agricultural interests of the country an advantage, it meets with my entire approval, because I think the condition of the farmer is such that there might be some degree of legislative favoritism properly shown to him.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, with the permission of the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. That, of course, meant that even in the realm of agricultural products there should be no discrimination, even on those products, as between one section and another. It simply provides that these basic industries, calling the attention of the commission to their necessity in our organized life, shall be placed at a rate that is as low as is consonant with the upkeep of the road. But it did not intend, and I am sure the Senator, who was a member of the committee at the time, will admit that it does not contemplate any such act, nor, in my opinion, does it give any permission to do the thing that it is here now charged the commission has done, namely, to fix rates by which a given commodity, such as coal, may enjoy a monopoly of a market as against another producing section.

Mr. BRUCE. Still the Senator is bound to admit that under the legal meaning of the import of that act it does provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission is to look into the entire rate structure, so far as it affects those products or gives undue advantage as between the various localities and parts of the country to various classes of traffic, and so forth, and then to make, in accordance with law, such changes, adjustments, and redistribution of rates and charges as may be found necessary to correct any defects so found to exist. I may say that that law was in some respects a very unwise law, and is more responsible than the Interstate Commerce Commission itself for the abuses or the alleged abuses of which the Senator from Kentucky is speaking.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that the Hoch-Smith resolution was passed largely in the hope that some readjustment might be made in freight rates touching agricultural products. I supported it as a Member of the House.

The language itself is somewhat general. It had no relationship in the mind of the author of the resolution in the House—who was on the same committee of which I happened to be a member in the other body—in a broad sense to anything except agricultural products. As a matter of fact, it directed the commission to investigate the rate structure, with a view of the possibility of its readjustment; but the commission has not made that investigation, and none of the decisions of which complaint is made here were based upon the provision of the Hoch-Smith resolution, because they have not made the investigation, and have reported that it will, in all probability, take years for them to make the investigation so that they can carry the intention of Congress into effect.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, is not the Senator mistaken? In its original form the Hoch-Smith resolution, of course, may have contemplated a change in the existing law with reference to the agricultural interest only, but that is not true, I submit, as respects the resolution as finally passed. If the Senator will allow me, I will remind him there is an express, separate, and distinct clause in the Hoch-Smith resolution touching on agriculture, which provides:

> In view of the existing depression in agriculture, the commission is hereby directed to effect with the least practicable delay such lawful changes in the rate structure of the country as will promote the freedom of movement by common carriers of the products of agriculture affected by that depression, including livestock, at the lowest possible lawful rates compatible with the maintenance of adequate transportation service.

That, of course, has its especial and exclusive application to agriculture, but the earlier portions of the resolution are general in character. They apply to rates of all sorts, and give the commission the power to readjust all rates.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even taking the broadest possible construction of the language in the resolution, nowhere is there even the suggestion that Congress intended to empower the commission to use the medium of freight rates to build up one section of the country and to tear down another section of the country, agriculturally or otherwise.

Mr. BRUCE. I think that would be, of course, a most lamentable and indefensible result, but, all the same, the tendency of the latitude of discretion with which the commission is clothed by the resolution is to produce that very state of things.

Mr. SMITH. May I call the attention of both the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] to paragraph 2 of section 15a of the transportation act which, if liberally interpreted without reference to the context, would give the commission greater power than that which the Senator from Maryland has called attention to in the resolution of which I happen to be coauthor. The proviso in section 2 of paragraph 15a of the Esch-Cummins Act reads:

> That the commission shall have reasonable latitude to modify or adjust any particular rate which it may find to be unjust or unreasonable, and to prescribe different rates for different sections of the country.

It does not say different rates on the identical commodity, but it leaves that wide open to the commission. It says, "different rates for the different sections of the country." Of course, the context shows that the very thing could happen which the Senator from Utah was complaining of, namely, that in a sparsely settled community where the cost of transportation is intrinsically more expensive than in a highly developed community, a higher rate might be prescribed.

Mr. BRUCE. In other words, what it contemplates is that the rates shall be the same under the same conditions.

Mr. SMITH. That they shall be the same under the same conditions.

Mr. BRUCE. That is true.

Mr. SMITH. Under the decision of the commission in the recent rate case they have, as I interpret it, discriminated against one community and in favor of another on the question of rate adjustment. The roads themselves, as I understand, had not particularly desired a change; in fact, if my information is correct, the old rate the Northeastern States had was remunerative, but under the rate structure then existing the mines in Virginia found it profitable to mine coal and to send it in competition to the lake ports. That decision, however, practically puts an embargo on those mines in Virginia.

Mr. BRUCE. The commission have reached the conclusion that the respective transportation conditions under which coal is shipped from Pennsylvania and Ohio to the Great Lakes and the transportation conditions under which coal is shipped from West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee to the Great Lakes are different.

Mr. SMITH. The decision, if my reading of it is correct, is largely based upon the fact that they had the right to determine really the prosperity or condition of the industry in one community as against another. I shall refresh my memory as to that, because I think some amendment to the transportation act is necessary.

The fact of the business is, I think every student of economics in this country who realizes the relation that exists between transportation, production, and distribution agrees that we ought not to amend but to rewrite the entire transportation act.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina does not think, though, that a member of the Interstate Commerce Commisison ought to be punished for reaching a conclusion conscientiously, even though this conclusion may be erroneous?

Mr. SMITH. Not at all; but I think members of the commission ought to show regard for the legislation which we enact, so as to make it easy for them to keep conscientiously to the right.

Mr. BRUCE. So do I.

Mr. SMITH. We ought as legislators to make it as easy as possible for them to do right and as hard as possible to do wrong.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that regard I wish to say that I think Congress is the body that should establish the policies that shall govern the regulation of commerce in the United States, and not the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMITH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress has the power to establish policies and incidental to its power Congress happened to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commisison a broad jurisdiction in order that the railroads might be assured a fair return on their property. It was never conceived that under this authority rates might be shifted so as to enhance the industries of one State or section and depress those of others.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, and then I should like to proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART. I wish to state a condition which justified the Hoch-Smith resolution. The Senator from Maryland said it was wrong and should not have been adopted; but I wish to call attention to the fact that agriculture in the United States to-day furnishes 11 per cent of the freight tonnage of the United States, while it is paying 19 per cent of the freight rate, and if we consider the value of products the discrimination is even greater.

I am inclined to think the law does give the commission the power to consider the entire industry of agriculture in comparison with other industries; I think that was its purpose, but I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky if in the very act of the commission's deciding the reasonableness of a rate or the question of discrimination between rates is there not included as a part of it the question of the economic advantage or condition of the different communities?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is included in it the possibility of affecting economic conditions, but it was never the intention of Congress, in my opinion, to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to change any rate solely on the ground of economic advantage or disadvantage as between sections of the country, and especially as between different sections in the production of a given commodity, such as coal or lumber or salt or any other commodity that might be a matter of competitive commerce.

Mr. BROOKHART. I concede that, but when they decide that a certain rate is unreasonable and discriminatory and must be reduced and that another rate will stand or be increased, that has a tendency of itself to tear down one community and build up another.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is inevitable.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that is inevitable.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me? I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Is not the Senator aware that not only the interstate commerce law as it was originally enacted and subsequently amended by the Hoch-Smith resolution and the public service commission laws of this country generally empower regulatory bodies, such as the State public service commissions, to say whether a rate unjustly and unreasonably discriminates against one locality as compared with another?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. There is nothing unusual, nothing uncommon, nothing extraordinary about that power.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true; but even before the transportation act was passed the Interstate Commerce Commission had the power to determine whether any rate was unduly prejudicial or unduly discriminatory as between sections. If a rate was unduly lowered in order to discriminate against one shipper as against another or one community as against another, the Interstate Commerce Commission had the power to take that into consideration; but where they say in one decision rendered two years ago that a rate is reasonable and just and that it is not either prejudicial or discriminatory, and two years later decide again that it is not prejudicial or discriminatory but, based upon the same facts, it is unreasonable, and therefore they reduce it as to one section of the country and warn the railroads in another section of the country that they can not reduce their rates to compete with a section which they are trying to favor, I say that is a power never intended by Congress to be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will remember that the Supreme Court of the United States once said that the Federal income tax law was constitutional and then a few years later that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. BARKLEY. But we amended the Constitution to remedy the defect of unconstitutionality as it was decided by the latter decision.

Mr. BRUCE. The second decision was made, according to my recollection, before the amendment of the Federal Constitution was made. I think the Senator's memory is at fault. I think before there was any change in the Federal Constitution at all the Supreme Court of the United States reversed itself in respect to the income tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think so. My memory may be at fault, but I think the last decision made an amendment to the Constitution necessary; otherwise there would have been no need of amending the Constitution; Congress could have passed an income tax law without amending the Constitution.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the Lake Cargo case has been brought up—and I hesitate to enter upon a discussion of it, because I do not wish unjustly to criticize the commission—I think it might be somewhat enlightening to the Senate to refer to it briefly.

So far as this question is concerned, it has come down to a battle between sections. It is no longer, as it used to be, a question of a fight between a shipper and a railroad nor necessarily a fight between railroads. Years ago, when the coal mines of Kentucky were first opened up as well as the coal mines of West Virginia and of Tennessee—and they produce the better quality of coal by the way, a coal of higher volatility—the coal fields of Pennsylvania began a drive on the Interstate Commerce Commission to bring about what they called a differential in freight rates. So a differential of 7 cents per ton was allowed. They were not satisfied with that; they continued their drive until they got a differential of 9 cents, and then they continued until they got a differential of 17 cents, and they continued the drive until they got a differential of 25 cents a ton in the freight rate between the coal fields of Pennsylvania and the other coal fields of the country, especially those of Kentucky, Tennessee, and West Virginia.

In spite of this constant widening of the difference between the freight rates from Pennsylvania and those from Kentucky and West Virginia, the fields in Pennsylvania lost ground in the percentage of coal they shipped to the Great Lakes; and, in proportion as they lost ground by reason of the economic conditions and by reason of the quality of their coal, they intensified their drive on the Interstate Commerce Commission to widen the differential again. So in 1925 the question came up on the request for a reduction of the freight rate upon coal from Pennsylvania, and the Interstate Commerce Commission decided against that contention. They held that the existing relationship as to rates between the two sections was not unduly prejudicial nor discriminatory. They held that the rate from Pennsylvania was not per se unreasonable. Then began a drive such as will always occur wherever the commission sets itself up to decide between sections of the country.

The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania on this floor denounced the commission, and elsewhere he even went so far as to say that it ought to be abolished, because in a decision in 1925 it had not complied with the wishes of the coal operators of his State.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield, briefly.

Mr. COPELAND. Did not the Senator from Pennsylvania also go about threatening slaughter and saying there would be trouble if the President did not appoint some man favorable to him?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Not only did he denounce the commission and declare himself in favor of its abolition, but he went so far as to boast that unless the President should appoint somebody to represent Pennsylvania all sorts of dire consequences were to follow. The President appointed Mr. Cyrus W. Wood, from the State of Pennsylvania, who was committed to this policy of discrimination in which the Senator from Pennsylvania was interested and which the commission had denied in 1925. The Senate, by an overwhelming majority, rejected that appointment; and then a strange thing happened. Two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission who had joined in the decision in 1925 against the discrimination that Pennsylvania asked for changed their views and made a former minority into a majority; and in May of 1927 the same commission, with one exception, that had decided that these relative rates were not unjust and prejudicial or discriminatory, the same commission that had decided in 1925 that the rate from Pennsylvania to the lake ports was not unreasonable but was a reasonable and fair rate changed its opinion and consented that the same rate, based on the same facts and the same circumstances, was unjust and unreasonable, and reduced it 20 cents per ton, while at the same time holding that the rate as between these other fields and Pennsylvania was still undiscriminatory and not prejudicial. The very circumstances that brought about the change in the attitude of the commission, the drive from the Senator from Pennsylvania, the onslaughts of criticism hurled at the commission by him, make it extremely unwise that either Congress or the commission should set itself up or should create an agency that would place the power of deciding the welfare and fate of one community as against another altogether on the basis of economic or industrial conditions, because whenever that condition is brought about every Senator, every community, every section of our country will be demanding that there shall be somebody appointed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to be a special pleader for the industries in that particular section of the country.

Already bills have been introduced dividing the country into regions and providing that members of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed from these various regions. I am not declaring myself either in favor of or against that amendment to our law; but I do say that when one section of the country finds the commission, under either an assumed authority or the exercise of a secondary authority or an incidental authority, undertaking by the manipulation of freight rates to say that one section of the country shall prosper and blossom, and another shall be visited by a blight upon its industries, it is not strange that any section of the country or any State would desire to have on that great commission somebody to represent its industries.

I have always looked upon the great Interstate Commerce Commission somewhat as I look upon the Supreme Court of the United States. There have been complaints broadcast over the country against government by commission. It has been stated that there are too many commissions and bureaus set up in our departments and independent of departments. We know that all of them are always grasping for power never intended to be conferred by Congress; but I have always felt that the one commission that had justified itself from the very beginning of its existence was the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I could not foresee the time ever coming when it would either set itself up or Congress would set it up as a sectional board to decide between sections of the country, and say that one industry shall prosper and another shall not. If the time ever comes when that tendency shall be crystallized into a fixed policy, the great esteem in which the Interstate Commerce Commission has been held in years gone by will be lost, which I should regard as nothing less than a calamity.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I call the attention of the Senator to Article I, section 9, clause 6, of the Constitution, which reads:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

I think I agree with the Senator, who appears to be contending that Congress has no constitutional power to enact any law delegating any power to any commission to prefer one section of the country over another; and I think the Senator's argument, if I grasp his views, would be sustained by this section of the Constitution.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator for his interruption. It is my contention that Congress has no power to enact any law that would discriminate in commerce as between different sections of the country, taking the word "port" there to be used in its general sense of meaning places of entry and of exit for the commerce of the United States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. But, even if Congress had any such power, it has not conferred it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will note, the first part of that clause does not mention "ports" merely; inhibits any preference by any regulation of commerce as to ports.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the clause of the Constitution just quoted, would not the long and short haul rate that is established or permitted by the act of Congress, and sometimes approved by the commission, be unconstitutional?

Mr. BARKLEY. It might be. Of course, the only excuse ever offered for the long and short haul provision of the interstate commerce act was in order that the railroads might not drive out water competition. On most of the rivers now there is not any competition, anyhow, but that result was brought about by entirely different conditions.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is true, too.

Mr. BARKLEY. In regard to this case I am somewhat embarrassed in referring specifically to it; but in order to show that what I am talking about was in the minds of the commission when they reversed their decision of 1925, wherein they said these rates were not discriminatory and not prejudicial and not unreasonable, in their reversal in 1927 they undertake to justify their new decision not because the rates are prejudicial or discriminatory, because they specifically say they are not, but they undertake to justify their new decision by saying that the rate is unreasonably high from Pennsylvania to the Lakes.

Of course, after they decided that it was not unduly discriminatory or prejudicial, the only reason or excuse upon which they could reduce it from that field and deny a similar reduction to another field would be that it was unreasonable and unjust; and, of course, having made up their minds to render that sort of decision, they would base it upon the unreasonableness and injustice of the rate itself. But in a letter written by one of the commissioners, who changed his views on the subject after the decision was rendered, he said that the object of the decision was to widen the differential between the fields of Pennsylvania and of West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and other southern coal fields.

That is not all. Not only in that case but in numbers of cases this tendency of the commission to try to adjust unequal economic and industrial conditions has been assumed by them. There have been requests made in 35 cases by railroads to reduce rates from one section to another, and in those 35 cases the Interstate Commerce Commission has denied the railroads the right to reduce the rates. I do not contend that all of these denials were based upon the assumed authority of the commission to pass on the economic conditions of various sections of the country, but some of them are, and a large portion of them are. There are 35 cases in which the commission denied a reduction of rates applied for by the railroads themselves, and there are only 9 cases where the commission has permitted the railroads to reduce their rates accordingly.

There are seven cases in which the commission itself has initiated a raise that was not desired by the railroads nor by the commercial interests that they served, but in order that the economic and industrial conditions of various sections of the country might, through the medium of freight rates, be equalized, and therefore the people in one section denied the right to take advantage of their natural location or the quality of their products in the markets of the Nation.

I say that the exercise of such a power was never contemplated by Congress. The exercise of such a power, if persisted in, will destroy the Interstate Commerce Commission, will destroy the high esteem in which it has been held by the railroads and by business and by the people at large, and we will have a clamor here for a commission to represent sections of the country rather than a commission that has the vision to look at all parts of the United States and try to harmonize its freight-rate structure not with a view to giving an undue advantage to one section over another but with an eye single to advancing the commercial welfare and the prosperity of the people of every section of the United States.

Therefore I am very much interested in the passage of this resolution, and I hope we will obtain information that will enable the Congress of the United States to decide whether there have been any extrajudicial or extralegislative powers assumed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if so, whether some amendment may not be adopted to curb that exercise of power. And if in an hour of unwisdom, with a legislative stop watch held upon the Houses of Congress, compelled in the last week of a short session to pass legislation that in all probability the majority of neither House understood, we have unwittingly conferred upon the commission a power which they are exercising unwisely and to the disadvantage of great sections of the country, and therefore to the disadvantage of the whole country, we may look toward some amendment of that law that will correct this evil.

Mr. President, I hope this resolution will be adopted, and that the report for which it calls will be speedily returned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas, as modified.

Mr. JONES. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. JONES. Has the resolution been referred to any committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution came over under the rule, and it was laid before the Senate for consideration to-day.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Ferris	McMaster	Shortridge
Bingham	Fess	McNary	Simmons
Black	Frazier	Mayfield	Smith
Blaine	George	Metcalf	Smoot
Blease	Gillett	Moses	Steiwer

Curtis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Warren
Deneen	Kendrick	Sackett	Waterman
Dill	King	Schall	Watson
Edge	La Follette	Sheppard	Wheeler
Edwards	McKellar	Shipstead	Willis

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in regard to the resolution. I confess I can not see why we should call on the Interstate Commerce Commission for copies of its decision. Of course, all the decisions of the commission are printed in bound volumes. It seems to me the most we might ask the commission to do would be simply to give us the references to its decisions bearing upon this particular subject. That is the first objection I see to the resolution. Of course, it is more or less of a formal character.

I certainly do think the resolution involves a reflection, a real, opprobious reflection, on the Interstate Commerce Commission in asking it under what sections of the interstate commerce law, and under what clauses of the Federal Constitution, it finds its authority "to equalize prosperity" in this country.

It seems to me that involved in such language as that there is an innuendo to which the Senate should not give its approval. Surely the Interstate Commerce Commission is not of such low estate that the Senate can intimate in a resolution that it has so far forgotten its obligations under the Constitution and laws of the land as to render decisions for the purpose of equalizing prosperity; that is to say, decisions completely usurping the authority of Congress and of the President of the United States. If the language of the resolution were changed in that respect, I should be willing to vote for it, because, after all, it is a mere request for information, information, doubtless, that is to be used for the purpose of making an assault on the confirmation of Mr. Esch when that comes along in due course of parliamentary procedure, but still information. But I do think that enough respect is entertained by the people of the United States for the Interstate Commerce Commission, a commission that is held, I venture to say, in higher esteem than almost any other agency of the Government except the Supreme Court of the United States, to induce us to forbear, in a resolution asking for information, to attempt to fix nothing less than a stigma to the character and standing of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the statement just made by the Senator from Maryland is to me an astounding proposition. During the course of the debate this morning he himself took the floor to show that under the law the commission has the power to regulate rates with regard to the prosperity of sections or communities. Then he assumes to criticize the resolution on the ground that it asks the commission to send to the Senate the decisions which pertain to that subject.

Mr. President, this is one of the big questions relating to transportation. It is not altogether a one-sided question, as I think this debate has disclosed, but there is not a word in the resolution which any mind except that of the Senator from Maryland can interpret into an unfair criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I am informed that my pair, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], if present, would vote "yea." Consequently I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRATTON. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON. I am informed that my pair, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], if present would vote "yea." I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily absent on official business. If present, they both would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] has a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are detained on official business.

The Chief Clerk recapitulated the vote, showing one vote in the negative.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am still unwilling to make it unanimous.

The result was announced—yeas 68, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—68

The preamble was agreed to.

WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION IN ALEXANDRIA, VA.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there will be a celebration in Alexandria on the 22d of February in commemoration of George Washington's birthday. A very large parade will be held. The President of the United States will be there, the Governor of Virginia will be present, and I have been requested to extend an invitation to the Senate to be present upon that interesting occasion. I send to the desk the invitation, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the invitation will be printed in the RECORD.

The invitation is as follows:

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY ASSOCIATION,
Alexandria, Va., January 16, 1928.

To Senate of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: It has been the custom of Alexandria, Va., for many years, from time to time, to celebrate the birthday of Gen. George Washington on February 22 with a parade of a civic, military, and fraternal nature. On this occasion we have present many distinguished guests, and it has been our further custom to extend an invitation to your honorable body to be present as our guests on this occasion.

We therefore extend a most cordial and earnest invitation to you to be present in Alexandria, the home city of George Washington, on February 22, 1928, and witness, as the guests of our association, the parade in honor of Gen. George Washington's birthday.

Most courteously and respectfully yours,

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY ASSOCIATION,
J. WM. MAY, President.
M. E. GREENE, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, returned, in compliance with the Senate's request, the message of the Senate announcing its agreement to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 700) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 5583. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near Presidio, Tex.;

H. R. 6099. An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York and Vermont to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain between Crown Point, N. Y., and Chimney Point, Vt.; and

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate Resolution 128.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, no Member of this body has a higher regard than I for the tradition which limits the Presidency to two terms.

Every Member of this body is in accord with this fundamental principle. No resolution or vote is necessary to record our sentiments or the sentiments of the American people on this subject. In fact, there has never been in any responsible quarter any question about it.

The sponsors of the resolution upon which we are called upon to vote have very frankly conceded that their purpose in offering it is because they profess to see a danger that the present incumbent may be induced to violate this tradition. But whether they had that purpose or not, it will be construed by many Americans as being so motivated. It is aimed at a danger which can only exist upon the assumption that the President of the United States would be guilty of an act of bad faith.

I do not subscribe to the proposition which has been advanced by some of those who have spoken in opposition to this resolution, namely, that had Mr. Coolidge chosen to become a candidate it would not have been a violation of the tradition. I am frank to say that, in my judgment, the candidacy of any President after he has twice taken the oath of office is contrary to the spirit of this tradition.

I do, however, assert that the President's declination of a candidacy was so clear and unequivocal that to impute to him now the suggestion that he would repudiate his statements and accept a nomination under any political emergency or pressure is an unwarranted reflection upon the high character which I concede President Coolidge possesses. He is not the man who means one thing and says another.

Though I differ with some of President Coolidge's political philosophy, I recognize that he possesses great strength with the American people, and this has been largely due to the confidence the people have had in his integrity, in his straightforwardness, and sincerity of purpose. I believe the public can rely upon his declaration in this matter as being actuated by the same frankness and same sincerity which has always characterized his public service.

It had been suggested here that no one knows the motives which prompted his declaration. While it is true that no one knows, each of us is at liberty to form his own judgment—and in my judgment, respect for a tradition of our Republic was the controlling motive in Mr. Coolidge's decision. I can not bring myself to lend support to a resolution which by indirection reflects upon the good faith of the President of the United States in view of his solemn statement to the American people.

For the reason only that I do not choose to instruct the President or appear to be doubtful or distrustful of the President's attitude toward more than two terms in the Presidency, I shall vote against the resolution.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will agree, and I shall later move, with his assent, I hope, that the second paragraph of the resolution be stricken therefrom in order that there may be no suggestion and no hint from the action of the Senate that we have in any way attempted to reflect upon or question the good faith of our President. I think we ought to accept in good faith, as sincere and as honest, the positive statement of the President of the United States that he will not again be a candidate for the office.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Massachusetts contends that the resolution by indirection reflects upon the good faith of the President of the United States when he made his statement first in the Black Hills on August 2 and which he amplified at the meeting of the Republican National Committee on December 6 last. It seems to me that the very clause in the resolution which the Senator from Massachusetts suggests he is going to move to strike out would place the Senate upon record as interpreting President Coolidge as having been sincere in his statements and commends him for the action which he has taken in sustaining the antithird-term tradition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose the Senator from Wisconsin will not deny the fact that the resolution has been presented because of fear that in a political emergency a call may be made by the Republican Party upon the President to set aside the statement that he has made that he will not be a candidate and seek to have him become a candidate?

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to ask me a further question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I stated on the floor very frankly when this resolution first came up for consideration that I had introduced a resolution on the subject of a third presidential term on the 22d day of February, 1927, that I intended to introduce a similar resolution at this session of Congress, and that I had not done so because it had been generally interpreted by the people of this country—and to that assumption I agreed—that the President of the United States was sincere and meant what he said when he stated that he did not choose to run, and when he subsequently further amplified his statement to the Republican National Committee.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts and all others who are conversant with political developments in this country know, as I stated at the time I introduced the resolution some days ago, that there were certain powerful interests in the Republican Party that did not accept the statement of the President of the United States as being sincere and were endeavoring to create a situation where he would be drafted as the nominee of the Republican convention.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the Senator's position; he has been extremely frank and fair and ably presented his resolution; but I still insist that the resolution suggests the possibility of the President of the United States wavering and setting aside this time-honored tradition if political pressure dictated such a course.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] first addressed the Chair, and he is recognized.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely wish to address a question to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. Anyone who will take the time to look at the wording of the resolution will see that the second resolving clause of the resolution is not in praise of the President. It "commends observance of this precedent by the President." Interpreted grammatically, it merely advises him to observe it. It is not in praise of him, however, at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It suggests a fear that in an emergency the President may change his mind and the Senate begs him not to do so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hesitate to enter into an argument with the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] over an analysis of the sentence, but, if I understand the English language, it seems to me that the statement is just as direct and straightforward as it could be made. The language reads:

> And be it further
> Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will insert the word "the" between the word "commends" and the word "observance" there can be no question even as to grammatical construction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would be perfectly willing to modify the resolution to that extent, because my intention in drawing the resolution certainly was to make that declaration without equivocation or evasion; and, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, I will modify the resolution by inserting the word "the" after the word "commends" in line 9.

Mr. BINGHAM. However, Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will look back at the preceding clause of the resolution, he will find that it reads:

> The precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office.

So the Senator will see that it is impossible to commend the President for having done something which he has not done, for he has not retired. It is clear that the use of the word "by" in the last line of the resolution should be superseded by the word "to." The obvious intent of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin is "that the Senate commends observance of this precedent to the President." [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President. That may be language which would suit the Senator from Connecticut, as he is alleged to be a very close friend of the President of the United States, but I could not accept that as a statement of my intent in drawing the resolution, which, I assure the Senator from Connecticut and all other Senators, was entirely sincere.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin what was his intent? Was it to praise the President or to advise him or inferentially to criticize him or others who might think he would make the most excellent President during the next four years——

Mr. CARAWAY. Nobody thinks that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Even though he has served for a time approaching eight years. What was the—I will not say the latent—but what was the controlling purpose or intent of the Senator from Wisconsin in using language in the resolution which, perhaps, might be subject to some doubt?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from California has raised a question with regard to what the language of the resolution intends, and I have endeavored to state frankly exactly what I intended to convey by it. I will say further to the Senator that I have on at least two occasions stated exactly the reason for my reintroduction of this resolution; and I assure the Senator that I have no latent or hidden motives. I refer the Senator to the statement which I made at the time this resolution first came up for discussion, and I also call his attention to the statement which I made a few moments ago in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the motives of the Senator from Wisconsin may be impugned, then all the Members of Congress from New England, when they voted for a similar resolution, were also actuated by unholy motives, were they not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator is correct, except that there were two members of the delegation from New England in the House in 1875 who did not vote for the resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. There were two who voted against it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; there were two who voted against it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That had not been my remembrance. However, every member from Massachusetts voted for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All but one.

Mr. CARAWAY. Which one voted against it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not recall the name just now.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, he has been forgotten. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I am not impugning motives, but hereafter, if the Senate will tolerate it, I will undertake to express my view as to just what this extraordinary, this simple declarative sentence, having Lindley Murray in mind, means, if it means anything.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, when the resolution was first called up I had intended to address the Senate upon it at some length, because it involves a problem of wide interest, especially when historically considered, but I am not inclined to do that at this time, because of physical conditions which do not comport with easy speech.

The resolution involves the question of presidential eligibility to reelection. That I regard as its most important feature. In the Constitutional Convention that question was very widely discussed and on it there was a wide difference of opinion. In the Constitutional Convention the principle of a short term and quick responsibility was contended to be a fundamental principle of American democracy. As to whether such quick response would be conserved better by limiting tenure as well as limiting the term, or whether it would be conserved better by limiting the term and extending the tenure was a question of doubt.

As everyone conversant with the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention knows, there were different views and different decisions reached at different times; in other words, the convention reversed itself on this particular subject.

When the question arose in reference to the Chief Executive, the convention originally proposed a term of seven years, with ineligibility for reelection. When a vote was called upon that proposal Washington was included in the list of those who voted against it. Although he did not make any comment at the time, later on, as is well understood, Washington had a conversation with Jefferson on the matter, and they did not agree. Also Washington wrote a reply to General Lafayette, who specifically addressed a letter to Washington on the subject of ineligibility to reelection. In the reply of General Washington he took a decided position against the Jeffersonian view. So it was decided not to limit tenure. The Constitutional Convention did fix a short term, but kept open the question of tenure, so that if experience might count for anything it could be utilized in the administration of the Government.

I think that the most concrete illustration of the difference between a limited term and a limited tenure will be found in the case of Members of both legislative bodies. The term of Members of the House and Members of the Senate is fixed, but their tenure is not limited. Neither is there a prohibition of eligibility to reelection in either case, nor is there in the case of the Chief Executive. In other words, the Constitutional Convention decided in both cases that a limitation on tenure was not wise, and that the question of eligibility to reelection should be kept open as a privilege on the part of the people.

In the case of the executive branch of the Government we have in practice both the limit of term and the limit of tenure. Custom thus far has limited the tenure of the Executive to two terms. That may have the force of law, but there is no constitutional inhibition against extending the term of the Executive beyond the second term. There is no inhibition whatever, as every student of constitutional law must recognize. Neither is there any inhibition in regard to the Members of this body or the Members of the House of Representatives.

I made some notes on another occasion of the practice in the House of Representatives as well as in the Senate.

If we take the Sixty-ninth Congress for purposes of study, the House of Representatives contained a Member who was serving, in the Sixty-ninth Congress, his seventeenth term. His term was two years. His tenure had been 34 years. In that Congress there was 1 Member serving his sixteenth term, 1 serving his fifteenth term, 1 serving his fourteenth term, 2 Members serving their twelfth term, 9 serving their eleventh term, 10 serving their tenth term, 7 serving their ninth term, 15 serving their eighth term, 35 serving their seventh term, 46 serving their sixth term, 42 serving their fifth term, 64 serving their fourth term, and so on. In other words, the rule in the House is limited term, but unlimited tenure, upon the basis that experience is of value in legislation.

The same thing is true in this body. It may be of interest to know that the representative in the Constitutional Convention who was nearest Thomas Jefferson was George Mason, of Virginia, the father of the famous Bill of Rights of Virginia, the first of its kind in the history of the world. George Mason raised the question of limiting the tenure of Members of the Senate and argued that Senators should not be elected for more than one term and, it seemed to me, employed in his argument a force that is second only in effect to that which he applied to the Executive—not much less. When the vote was taken, and the tenure of Members of the Senate was not limited to one term, George Mason gave it as his mature judgment that a great mistake had been made by the Constitutional Convention.

While I would not be facetious in this discussion at this time and should not be inclined and should not permit myself to offer any resolution for mere effect, it would be a proper thing for a resolution to be offered here in the form of an amendment to the present resolution to authorize a commission to study, at least, the feasibility of not only limiting the tenure of the President but limiting the tenure of Senators, and whether there is a basis for the argument that was adduced in the Constitutional Convention that no Senator should serve longer than one term. It would be interesting to me, as it would be interesting to everyone, to have an investigation of that sort and to get the facts upon which argument of that kind could be adduced. As we believe that unlimited tenure in this body employs experience and capitalizes ability, so it seems to me it is equally true in the case of the President.

Mr. President, I have never been averse to the spirit of a resolution that would announce an opinion upon whether service beyond a second term is a wise course or not. I have in the past argued that it would be better, probably, for the country and everyone concerned if in practice the presidential term were longer than at present and the President were ineligible to reelection. I would not adduce that on the basis that has been adduced here by individual Senators, on the ground that a President would prostitute his first term in order to secure a second term, or that he would prostitute his second term in order to secure a third term. I should not put it upon that basis at all; but I am aware that the President of the United States is under a burden that it is quite difficult for him to sustain from the pressure that comes to him from outside sources that is made possible by his reelection. In other words, Presidents break under the burdens of the office very largely through attempting to respond to requests that can not be met.

I do not believe I speak amiss when I say I can not avoid the thought that the life of the late President Harding—who seemed to permit his personality to go out to everyone who appeared in his presence—was very much shortened by the burdens of the office.

The very last conference I had with him was on Thursday before he left for Alaska on Tuesday, when he spoke in rather pathetic terms of the burdens of the office of the Presidency. Anyone who knew him and knew how he regarded the pressure that was brought upon him in connection with the requests of friends for this and that would recognize that he would wear under it, and probably break under it.

Not every President would be so affected. I have thought that it might be wise for us to pass a constitutional amendment to extend the term of the President and limit it to one term; but it has never been looked upon with favor. The proposal has been offered over and over again in the form of an amendment, and it has never been seriously considered by either body, House or Senate; and, after all, I suppose it would be still better for us to continue the practice of limiting term but not limiting tenure except by the vote of the people, as is done in the House, and as is done in the Senate. At any rate, whether it is wise or otherwise, that has been the practice from the beginning.

It is not a mooted question that the third term that was denied originally to the Presidents who might have been elected to a third term was not denied them by the people. It was simply never requested by those who might have achieved a third term. There has been much confusion about Washington's attitude. Over and over again we hear it stated in this and other bodies that Washington set the example of turning away the honor of a third election as if it were a matter of principle with him, instead of a matter of purely personal convenience.

I admit that the precedent was set by Washington. I admit that he was not elected to a third term; but I will not admit that he believed that a third term was vicious, or that he ever thought it was unpatriotic, or that he thought it would not be a wise course. The truth about the matter is that when he asked Madison to draw up in convenient shape what would suit him for a farewell address it was at the end of his first term. Washington had intended not to remain even to the end of his first term, as is known by every historian. When he was elected, having presided over the Constitutional Convention, having been regarded as the only one to be presented, as nobody was presented against him, he made it known that he would accept the office as a public service, but he did not want to be bound to a complete term of four years. He would inaugurate the Government, and, at convenience, retire.

There was not any doubt of his intention to retire at the end of the first term, even though he might have changed his views about retiring before the term was over. He stated to Madison that he wanted an address prepared suitable to his retirement. Madison put it into form. In that address I find these words, which are constantly quoted by the proponents of this resolution as being the words of Washington:

> May I be allowed further to add as a consideration far more important that an early example for rotation in an office of so high and delicate a nature may equally accord with the republican spirit of our Constitution and the ideas of liberty and safety entertained by the people.
> "Rotation in office!" That is stated as being in accord with our views of democratic government.

Mr. President, that statement was written by Madison. That statement was not in the President's Farewell Address when he finally delivered it to the American people. This particular item of Madison's draft was never accepted by President Washington.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator said that that statement had been quoted by the proponents of this resolution. Will the Senator state what Senator it was that quoted it?

Mr. FESS. I do not recall anyone in the Chamber who quoted it; but in the discussions against the third term throughout the country by historians Madison's draft is constantly reviewed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I just wanted to make it clear that no proponent of the resolution in this Chamber had made that quotation. As a matter of fact, I stated in the brief remarks I made that a frank discussion of this question must admit that Washington had never gone on record as being opposed to a third term.

Mr. FESS. Yes, Mr. President; and I want to commend the author of the pending resolution for his frank discussion, and especially his frank statement in reference to Washington, because it is quite different from the usual statements on this subject. I commend the Senator for his frank statement.

I think probably I should have amended my language by saying, instead of the proponents of this resolution, the proponents of the theory against the third term; then I would have been wholly within the range of accuracy.

On the other hand, Washington, because of developments in Europe and our complications on foreign affairs, decided that he would again accept the nomination and election. Then at the approach of the end of the second term, which was some time about 1795 or 1796, Washington called to his aid Hamilton, and asked him to throw into form a draft that would be suitable as a farewell address. That farewell address was to express the views of the President, and if he had any idea whatever of objecting to a third term on the ground that it would be unpatriotic or that it would not be a wise course, rather than upon the ground of his personal tastes and personal conveniences, it would have been in that address that the statement would have been made, and the farewell address of the President of 1796 can be scanned from the first word to the last and there will be found no hint of his objection to a third term in principle. I want that to be specifically understood as saying that Washington's declination to be elected a third time was not on the ground of the principle, but only because it was a personal convenience to him to retire.

As to Jefferson and Madison and Monroe, they represented an entirely different school of politics. There were two well-defined schools of politics in the Constitutional Convention, and while Jefferson was not in that convention he did have his representatives there, especially in Madison and in George Mason, of Virginia. They well represented the views of Jefferson, though Madison was much more Federal in his theory than was Jefferson. He would not go along as far as Jefferson would go.

Jefferson was dominated by the fear of autocratic government, and that was normal with him. In the first place, the theory of Jefferson, however we may account for it, was that there should be no interference with the liberty of the individual in government. He believed that that government was best which governed least. He believed that the citizen was better subserved in his opportunity and ability when unhindered as much as possible by government decree, and he extended that view to the States, so that Jefferson very frequently is regarded as the advocate of State rights, if not State sovereignty. I do not believe that Jefferson can be described as being the exponent of State sovereignty in the degree that John C. Calhoun was later on. Nevertheless, Jefferson wrote the Kentucky resolutions, and the Kentucky resolutions, outside of the Virginia resolutions, which were written by Madison, are the best exponent of the principle of State rights that we have in American literature. They were written by Thomas Jefferson.

Jefferson emphasized the idea of liberty. Jefferson feared autocracy. Jefferson was afraid of too much power, too much government. However we may explain the source of his fear, that was fundamental with him, and I regard it as tremendously important not only in any study of our political theory but in the development of our American poltical theory.

While Jefferson, therefore, was not in the Constitutional Convention to work out his ideas, he was in contact and communication with the men who were there who represented his views, and one of his views, specifically uttered, was that terms should be elective, and not appointive, that terms should be short and not long, that tenure should be short and not long. In other words, he was in favor of not only shortening the term but of preventing the term being extended beyond a certain limit, for fear of too much control by officialdom. He was quite normally committed to the idea of one term and no reelection. He communicated with Washington in the matter. He expressed his disapproval of the plan of the Constitutional Convention as it finally completed its work on that subject.

It is true that Jefferson did not recommend in his message, and did not mention in his inaugural address, that he had stood against eligibility to reelection, but all along the years to 1826, when he died on the 4th of July, Jefferson was in close communication with correspondents on matters of government, especially with reference to the democratic theory, of which he was an exponent, and it was generally known that he had never given up his idea that there should be a limit of the term of the Executive to one year.

Finally, just before he died, this distinguished exponent of the theory of government, one of our country's greatest draftsmen of political documents, especially in reference to the democratic theory, wrote as a sort of last will and testament that famous autobiographical note of 1826, in which he again said that he believed that the Executive should be denied reeligibility. It is not likely that he would have wanted to limit the Executive to one term if the term were a short term. I have found no indication anywhere that he was in favor of making the term four years, and the Executive ineligible for reelection with that short a term.

The one school which stood for the theory of quick responsibility to the people through short terms was represented first by Thomas Jefferson, followed by Madison, followed by Monroe, followed by Jackson, and then, while Cleveland would not be looked upon as viewing these problems in the same light precisely in which those men did, although he was a great Democrat, Cleveland took almost identically the same view.

The other day I made an exception in the case of Woodrow Wilson. Wilson was elected for a second term. At his first election, Wilson was elected upon a platform containing a plank declaring in favor of a single term. That does not mean that Wilson committed himself to that. It was stated the other day that when a man runs upon a platform, naturally that commits him. I happen to know that President Wilson had no regard for that particular plank, and while I have seen a statement recently that he so stated openly, I have never seen the statement; but I am aware that he did not believe in that particular plank at all. I have never charged that President Wilson, running on a plank favoring one term and then afterwards becoming a candidate for reelection, was guilty of any particular inconsistency.

I have thought that in the cases of Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, and Jackson, all of whom are on record as believing fundamentally that there should be no reeligibility in the Executive, they were inconsistent, in that their practice did not agree with their theory. Yet that, perhaps, has no force in an argument.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to contend that those men are on record in favor of one term where the term was four years?

Mr. FESS. No; so far as I know that dated back to the discussion in the Constitutional Convention as to whether there should not be a term limited to six or seven years, and ineligibility to reelection.

Mr. President, there is another phase of this resolution which calls for a litle more extensive investigation than I have been able to give to it; that is, whether a term is completed when another oath is taken, even though the tenure of the first would not last over a day, or whether when a Vice President had succeeded to the Presidency and had been afterwards elected for a four-year term a third term would begin if he should be reelected again, although his first term had not been a full one. It is on that particular point of dispute that I have been quoted in the press at times.

The first Vice President to become President was Tyler, who succeeded Harrison after Harrison had served only one month. Tyler's term, therefore, was 3 years and 11 months, short of the full term of 4 years by only 1 month. Nobody would deny that that was a full term. Tyler was a candidate for renomination, but was denied the opportunity of again running.

The next case was that of Millard Fillmore. Fillmore did not serve as President as long as did Tyler. It is not of any particular value, but I think it might be refreshing to Senators to have these facts. Fillmore served two years and nine months. Andrew Johnson served as President three years and ten and a half months. Arthur served as President three years and six and a half months. Roosevelt served as President during the balance of the term for which McKinley had been elected—for three years and six months. I think there will be little dispute that if these men had been reelected they would have been serving second terms, although the first terms had been short of four years.

When we apply that to the President we find that he served one year and seven months of the unexpired Harding term, that being less than two years, and is the only Vice President who came to the Presidency to serve less than half the period of his predecessor's term. The question that comes to my mind—and it would never have arisen had not the question of the candidacy of the present President been broached in the country—is whether one year and seven months make up a term. I should not think it would, but there are distinguished Senators here, well recognized for their ability in history and constitutional law, who not only say that the one year and seven months will make up the term, but that even if it be but one week or if it be but one day it would make up the term; in other words, if it is the administering of the oath for but a minute, that means that he has fulfilled the course limited to two terms. If the present President or any other President should serve as Vice President 3 years and 11 months and 29 days, lacking only one day of the full four years, and then take the oath because of the death of the President, and serve but one day as President, his taking of the oath of office and serving that one day would constitute his full first term, according to their contention.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. As this is only a tradition and not a constitutional provision with which we are dealing, so many things enter into and constitute the tradition that it would be very difficult to fix any definite standard by which to measure the particular phase of the matter which the Senator is now discussing. But there are two matters which we hear discussed in the ordinary walks of life, with the laymen, which have to do with it. We hear men say that no man in this country should be permitted to serve longer than Washington served, longer than Jefferson served, or Madison, if it is only a year longer. It is said by them that Washington served eight years, and somebody else proposes to serve nine years, and so forth. Those things all enter into the making up of the judgment of the people as the finality in the matter of tradition.

But the second proposition, speaking with reference to the present incumbent of the office, is this: Has the Senator any doubt that President Coolidge was renominated and reelected upon the strength of the record which President Coolidge made in that year and seven months rather than the record of his predecessor?

Mr. FESS. No doubt whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not catch the Senator's answer to that question.

Mr. FESS. I said there was no doubt whatever. The Senator asked me if I had any doubt, and I told him I had no doubt.

Mr. HARRISON. But no doubt about what?

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Idaho repeat his question?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish me to repeat it or have the official reporter read it?

Mr. HARRISON. I just did not catch it.

Mr. BORAH. I asked the Senator from Ohio if he had any doubt about the proposition that President Coolidge was renominated and reelected by his great majority on the strength of the record which he had made or on the record which his predecessor had made? In other words, he had a term and upon its record he was renominated and was elected.

Mr. FESS. I scarcely recognize the relevancy of the question, but I have no hesitancy in answering the question as I did.

Mr. President, I had hoped the Senators were going to give me some light that would give me some relief as to what is the second or first term. I should like to ask the Senator whether a year and seven months of an unexpired term is properly regarded as the first term of the President. Let me ask, if that be true, would it be so if it were one year, or would it be so if it were one month, or would it be so if it were one day?

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that the construction which would be placed upon the tradition, if it were involved in a campaign, would be that if the party had held office twice or held the term, whether short or long, and exercised the powers of the Presidency, he would be regarded as having had two terms.

Mr. FESS. Even had he served but one day?

Mr. BORAH. Even had he served but one day. As I said, this being a mere matter of tradition and not a constitutional provision or matter of law, there is no measure which we can bring to bear upon it unless we take the proposition of "term" as having held the office.

Mr. FESS. What I would like to have my friend from Idaho tell me is this: Would the services of one day of an unexpired term amount sufficiently in his mind that he, a believer in the theory of limiting it to two terms, would say that he is denied the right to run the next time?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is my view. I want to say that I think the anti-third-term principle is sound, but I do not think it is sacred. I have said many times that while I think in ordinary exigencies of political conditions in the country the third-term principle ought to be observed, I am perfectly willing, however, to also leave it to the judgment of the people or the electorate. I would not write it in the Constitution of the United States. There may be times and terms and conditions in which the people would judge it better to have the President for the third time than to change under the circumstances.

I think that condition would have arisen, as I said yesterday, had Lincoln's first term been his second term; that is to say, had the exigencies of the Civil War situation arisen at the close of his second term as they did at the close of his first term, the American people would have insisted on his being President again, and he would have been President. When we take into consideration the stupendous effort which was made by the leaders in the Republican Party to confine him to one term, when he was advised over and over again by the leaders that he could not be elected, but that, the people being heard from, he was renominated and reelected, in my judgment that same thing would have happened at the close of his second term under similar conditions. That exigency might be justified. I believe, too, that had Washington had upon his hands at the close of his second term the situation that he had at the close of his first term, he would have consented to be a candidate for the third time, and he would have been reelected for the third time.

But those are extraordinary and exceptional conditions, which are to be appealed to when the judgment of the people think the facts justify it. In all ordinary conditions I think the third-term principle ought to apply. Therefore I would apply it, as I said a moment ago, to anyone who had held the office twice, whether it was a day or whether it was six months or a year.

Mr. FESS. The Senator would apply it as a principle, but open to exceptions on exceptional occasions?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the people. I have no doubt, in the light of the 150 years which have passed and the experiences we have had in regard to this matter, and judging by the examples of great men who have gone before and the political jealousy of the people, but that it is perfectly safe to leave it to the people. In other words, I would not write it into the Constitution of the United States. I would leave it a tradition.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator from Ohio overlook the fact that any rule, whether it is a third-term rule or other rule, to have any real significance and efficacy must be a rule of general application? There is always the possibility, of course, of a President dying within a month after he takes office or of a President dying two or three months afterwards and the Vice President becoming President. Now, a rule of general application can not speculate and should not speculate in the contingencies involved in the question of when the President may or may not die and be succeeded by the Vice President.

What the third-term tradition opposes, as I construe it, is the accumulation of personal prestige and authority that may be brought about by a man occupying the exalted office of President, with all the patronage and power that attach to it, for more than two terms. So enemies of a third term can not afford to take any risk as to the time when a President may or may not die. The rule should be broad and flexible enough to cover any and every mortuary contingency so far as the President is concerned. I think the Senator overlooks that.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the rule ought to be so regarded that it can be broken just as easily as kept, and then there would be no embarrassment at all.

Mr. BRUCE. No; I would have it inviolate. I would not have it turn on the question as to when the President may die and be succeeded by the Vice President. The rule, to have any value, must, like all rules of that kind that have any value, be uniform.

Mr. BORAH. There is no way to make this tradition inflexible. If it is not a constitutional provision or written in the law, there is no way by which to make it inflexible, because it depends entirely upon the judgment of the electorate. Unless we write it in the Constitution I do not know how we can make it inflexible.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, what I have been trying to indicate that is embarrassing to me is whether taking the oath of office complies with the full term of four years and has the same effect as a full four-year term. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] thinks that the situation which I have suggested might not arise. It might very easily arise, and that is the thing I want to know about. What makes the first term? What makes a full term? Is one day just the same as four years? I insist that it is not that, although the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] thinks so, and Doctor Butler, president of Columbia University, says it is true. The Senator from Maryland thinks that completes the term. I can not see it in that way. However, it is perfectly safe to leave it as the Senator from Idaho puts it, and then nobody is embarrassed. No matter how much we talk here, no matter what opinion might be expressed, let the people decide it. They will decide it one way or the other. One time it will be one way and another time it will be another way.

I fully agree with the Senator from Idaho in that if Washington would have permitted himself to run in 1796 he would have been elected without very much doubt.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. Just a moment. I think there is no doubt that if Andrew Jackson would have given any intimation that he wanted to succeed himself in 1837, instead of really appointing his own successor in Martin Van Buren, he could have elected himself more easily or as easily as to have selected his successor. I have no doubt about it.

I have not the slightest doubt that if President Lincoln had been spared to complete his second term, because of the popularity he had enjoyed and the confidence and love he had inspired, he could have been reelected. I also have not any doubt if Colonel Roosevelt had been nominated in 1912 without opposition, although having served, as he claimed, two terms, that he would have been easily elected, and if death had not taken him when it did there would not have been a single opposing candidate against him in 1920, and he would have been overwhelmingly elected in that year, notwithstanding the fact that he had been twice President. Now I yield to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Ohio, however, realizes that if a President were to die a month after he took office and were succeeded by the Vice President, who rounded out the term of the President, and then himself was elected to another term, and then to still another and another term, and in that way gradually—for that was the theory of Mr. Jefferson—became an emperor or an autocrat of some sort, it would not make much difference whether or not Presidents as a rule died after a longer period than one month after succession to office. One catastrophe would be enough fully to justify the anti-third-term tradition.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Maryland will agree with me, I am sure, that Jefferson's opposition to a third term was better fortified and more warranted than any opposition to a third term in this day would be. Jefferson lived at a time when the Republic was young, when we had no friends. He served in France with great honor, as the Senator from Maryland knows. He recognized the flux of political situations in Europe. He had written the Declaration of Independence, the greatest document of human liberty that has come from the hand of man, and it is significant that in that document every count of the indictment with the exception of 2—making 22 in all—begins with the personal pronoun "he" in reference to the King of England, of whom he was very fearful. Jefferson sat in the Legislature of Virginia, which was not then a sovereign State but a colony which ought to have had the right of local government, and he saw the legislature of his own State, of which he was a part, dissolved by a royal governor appointed by the King of England.

Jefferson had reason for fearing the dangers of executive usurpation. He also had reason for fearing the man on horseback, because Napoleon was in the saddle at that time. There is not the slightest fear of that to-day, is there?

Mr. BRUCE. The entire Republican convention in 1880 certainly cherished that fear as strongly as Mr. Jefferson ever did when it refused to give a third term even to such a military hero as General Grant. Mind you, there were no Democrats in that convention, and it was held some years after the split in the Republican Party of that time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, Grant was one of the world's greatest soldiers. In 1868 he was nominated by a unanimous convention; every vote in the convention being cast for him, and not a single vote being cast against him. He was elected by a tremendous majority. He was not, however, skilled in the politics of the country; he was only a soldier. Because of opposition to certain policies which General Grant announced, most of which I agree were very sound—and one of the fundamental principles of finance he sustained by a veto—he made himself extremely unpopular with the politicians of the country. Then in some appointments he offended a certain group, and all who have any familiarity with history will recall that the opposition grew so powerful that Horace Greeley led a revolt and the Liberal Republican Party was formed which put a candidate in the field in 1872 against Grant. Unfortunately, the Democratic convention indorsed Horace Greeley as did the Liberal Republicans, although a branch of them broke off and nominated Charles O'Conor. In 1872 the fight in the Republican Party was so bitter that it resulted in the breaking off of a large element of the party. Then, by 1875 there was such a falling away of support even among the Republicans that when Springer, of Illinois, introduced his resolution, that in language was similar to the one now pending, 164 Democrats—every Democratic Member of the House—voted for it and the opposition to General Grant was so strong that most of the Republicans voted for it.

Mark you, this was in 1875, preceding the famous battle of 1876, which is known as the "disputed Presidency." Then, in 1880, with this factional fight still running, the Republican Party, led on the one hand by Blaine and on the other hand by Conkling, was looking for a candidate. Grant was then making a trip around the world. He was feted in every capital of the Old World. He landed at San Francisco in 1880. Conkling said, "There is our candidate." He immediately took him up and undertook to nominate him for President in 1880. The contest was between Conkling and Blaine. Conkling had not the votes; Blaine had not the votes; and the compromise was the nomination of Garfield. There is not a scintilla of evidence that Grant could have been nominated, whether it had been after his first or second or third or fourth or even his twentieth term.

I think there can be no doubt about that. My suggestion to my friend from Maryland is to this effect: Whatever legitimate grounds there may have been against a third term in the early history of our country, those grounds do not now obtain. I do not think there is any fear whatever of the man on horseback, as was the case in the days of Napoleon.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator further, let me say that that may be true under ordinary circumstances, but suppose our country should find itself faced by turmoil and insurrection, or even revolution, if you please; and the fears of the propertied classes of the country, indeed, of all the conservative elements of the country, were very much aroused; does the Senator think that even under those conditions such a thing as a President gradually sliding into an inheritance, to use Mr. Jefferson's phrase, would be impossible?

Mr. FESS. I do not think that a resolution of the character now pending before the Senate would have any effect whatever upon retarding events if such a condition should arise. It would not make any difference what we may say here to-day.

Mr. BRUCE. I think it would.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so.

Mr. BRUCE. It is fair, I think, to assume that a resolution formally adopted by this body would have a certain degree of effect in molding public opinion.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, with the growth of industry in America, with great masses of our people employed in factories located in great centers of population and wholly dependent upon the continuance of their occupations for a livelihood, I confess I sometimes tremble when I think of the possibility of any derangement in industrial conditions such as might be caused by a great depression which would cause populations to suffer for want of work. I have no reference now to any political theory; I am speaking merely about the growth of population in great centers, dependent wholly upon one great branch of industry. In case that industry should fail to give employment, operatives be thrown out of employment, and a great strike ensue I can imagine that, under certain leadership, a despotism might follow.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator can imagine, in other words, that a man on horseback might come along under those circumstances.

Mr. FESS. However, I do not think that a vote in the Senate on the question of a third presidential term would have as much effect as a fly on a dog's ear in a case such as that.

Mr. BRUCE. I am sorry that the Senator entertains such a poor opinion of the influence of the Senate. I am sure the Senator will agree with me in thinking that on the eve of the World War there was no reason to believe that Italy, a country endowed with the freest of institutions, would ever pass under the sway of such an autocrat as Mussolini. Yet to-day Italy has just as much a dictator as ancient Rome ever had at any time in her history.

Mr. FESS. While that is true, I would not admit that what could be done in Italy could be done in America. I would not admit that for a moment.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know about that. The history of the Italian struggle for liberty is one of the most glorious things in human history. The Senator knows that.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. BRUCE. And the Italians had a great deal more from which to free themselves than we had when we waged our Revolutionary War.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is a student of history and he knows that for a hundred years before the Federal Constitution the thirteen Colonies were training themselves for government in which all the people should participate, and then, after 100 years of such training, there was convened the Constitutional Convention, which framed an instrument, containing only seven articles, that has been our bulwark of our liberty and our organic law for 139 years, during which time the country has never experienced a revolution. I do not think there is in America any danger at all of what has taken place in Italy. I do not for a moment think it possible.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows, though, what a desperate struggle the Italian people carried on to free the state from the church and from foreign influence.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I admit that.

Mr. BRUCE. That was one of the most strenuous contests that any people ever waged. The Senator surely remembers what a long step it was from the government of the Bourbons in Italy to Cavour and Mazzini.

Mr. FESS. I will simply remind my friend that there are eight nations in Europe now that might be regarded as being under dictators, all the result of the World War. There is not any possibility of that sort of thing taking place here in America with our population. We view the problems of government on an entirely different plane, and I think it is the result of 250 years of training; and no other nation has had the training that we have had in this form of government.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator realizes, of course, that the time will come when our country will be much more densely populated than it is now.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and our problems will be greater.

Mr. BRUCE. And there will probably be a great deal more social disaffection and unrest then than there is now. That is what Macaulay anticipated, the Senator will recollect, in his famous letter to Mr. Randall, the biographer of Jefferson, when he said that the trouble with our Government was that it was all sail and no anchor. That is not true at the present time; but if such a storm were to break in this country, as it is not difficult to imagine, we might desire considerably more anchor and less sail than we have now.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that de Tocqueville also made a prophecy that this Government could never stand perpetually in a republican form, and prophesied that it would not be many years until we would lose our existence. The Senator recalls that.

Mr. President, reverting to what I said a moment ago, that I think there is no doubt about what would have taken place in elections in spite of the third-term tradition if these persons had announced themselves candidates, I hope I shall not be regarded as violating the amenities of this Chamber if I say that I have looked upon the term of one year and seven months of the present President as a fraction of a term. I did not count that as a full term. I looked upon the close of the present term as not the completion of two terms. That is the reason why I constantly attempted to refute the idea that if President Coolidge were renominated there would be any violation of the third-term tradition. It would be a tenure longer than eight years; it would be an innovation to that extent—that is, no President in our history has ever served more than eight years—but, while it would be a year and seven months more than eight years, it would not be a violation of the third-term tradition. If that would be a violation of it, then one year more would be, or one day more would be; and I have thought that an untenable position.

What I said a moment ago about President Roosevelt I would say frankly to-day about President Coolidge—that if the way opens for his nomination I do not hestiate to say that he will be elected by one of the largest majorities ever given in an election, in spite of the tradition that friends of mine say would be broken on the third-term matter.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator does not think, I am sure, that the President could be induced, after he has practically given his word to the people of the United States not to be a candidate to succeed himself, to be a candidate again?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have noted with the greatest interest the Democratic planning and strategy that has surrounded the name of President Coolidge ever since the suggestion was made that he might be renominated. I admire the brilliant strategy. It is not only seen among Democratic Senators but it is read in every great Democratic newspaper. They are taking this view: The men who say that President Coolidge could not accept a nomination tendered to him when it is not sought because it would be bad faith, because it would be insincerity, because it would show a lack of character, are expressing a wish rather than a judgment. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. BRUCE. No, Mr. President; I say to the Senator, so far as I am concerned, that he is absolutely mistaken. No strategic motive of any kind enters into my convictions in relation to this subject. I have taken the President at his word; and I believe, and I shall continue to believe until I am absolutely disabused of the impression, that he is another one of our Presidents who has set a most inspiring example to the American people in declining a third term when the nomination, at any rate, for a third term was completely within his grasp. As I said the other day, I believe that he has been actuated by the same motives by which Jefferson was actuated, by which Madison was actuated, by which Monroe was actuated, and by which Jackson was actuated under similar circumstances; and I, for one, would have a much less high opinion of the President than I have if I thought that after having said what he has said he could be capable of allowing himself, his own motives, his own purposes, and his own words to be overruled by any external influence, however strong.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think we shall be compelled to accept the statement of the Senator in good faith as he has expressed it, although it is a happy situation for a Democratic leader to be in to have a conviction that fully comports with his wishes in the matter. It relieves some embarrassment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has had a good deal to say recently about strategy in connection with this subject. He has also credited the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] with good faith in the expression of his attitude.

It is recalled that after the President made his famous announcement, "I do not choose to run in 1928," the Senator from Ohio, according to press reports, placed on the President's announcement the same construction that he is placing on it now; and we read a story, generally published, that the Senator from Ohio was called to the White House and severely reprimanded for apparently questioning the good faith of the President's declaration, and for implying what he is implying now, that the President really did not mean what he said; that he was simply inviting pressure to induce him to run again, or was soliciting the influences of his party organization to draft him and force him to run. I wonder if the Senator from Ohio believed that the President meant what he said when he declared that he would not run again in 1928?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there is not any doubt about what the President meant to say. He meant precisely what he said.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There has been some question as to what "I do not choose to run in 1928" means.

Mr. FESS. He meant precisely what he said, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield for a further question? Why did the Senator seek to coerce, or to persuade, if he prefers that term, the President into violating his construction of his proper relationship to the campaign of 1928? Why did the Senator from Ohio try to induce him to run when he said he did not want to?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the wants of the President may not be the same as my own.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Manifestly; but why did the Senator from Ohio want the President to run for another term when the President said that he did not choose to do so?

Mr. FESS. For the same reason that the Democrats would like to find somebody that could win, which they can not do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh! Then the Senator from Ohio thought the President had a better chance to win than any other person mentioned among the Republican candidates?

Mr. FESS. No; the woods are full of Republicans that can win.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. We have them from Ohio and we have them from almost every State in the Union.

Mr. FESS. Of course we have.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But what I am trying to get the Senator to say is why he found it incumbent upon him to incur the lightninglike wrath of the Chief Executive by implying to the country that the President really did not mean that he did not want to run; that what he meant was that he wanted to be forced to run?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is trying to inject a personal matter here as to which I think I shall have to take Senators into my confidence and explain what they do not understand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, the Senator wants to make a confidential statement?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then will the Senator tell us if the President really did get mad with the Senator from Ohio when the Senator tried to force him to run again?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, just how far one ought to talk in the Senate about a newspaper episode is somewhat uncertain in my mind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator says——

Mr. FESS. I want the Senator to listen to me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. No; not now.

The President made a statement on August 2 at Black Hills. I was at Black Hills within a few days after that statement was published. I talked with the President about the statement and expressed my regret and surprise. I learned that the President desired to leave the presidential office on the 4th of March, 1929. I got the argument that this was not a one-man country; that there were plenty of other candidates; that the office was one of burdens. I had no intimation then, nor ever since, that the third-term idea had ever entered his mind. I assumed from what I could gain without quoting him that the office is one of burdens and of service, and that if the argument I was putting up that the country needed him was of any force, the same argument could be used four years from now, and for that reason there was no force in it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Now, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. No; not yet.

I read the statement in the light of possibilities. Although there was not any doubt of the President's meaning, I could not see that he would be foreclosed by what he said from accepting a nomination in case it was tendered him. That is the argument that I offered to the public without any authority from him.

The time came when I was in New York City, and the New York Times wanted an interview. I did not hesitate to say to them that while the President had taken himself out of the candidacy so far as a statement would go, I did not feel that the American people were denied the right to nominate him and tender him the nomination, even though he had stated that he did not choose to run.

A few days after that I was not called to the White House; I went to the White House to talk on some other matters. We had a good time; and when leaving——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FESS. Not now. Upon leaving, I said to the President, "I hope that my frequent references to your being called in 1928 are not embarrassing to you." Then he frankly let me know that they were embarrassing to him. While I insisted that there was no ground for it, that the people did not believe I was talking with his approval but upon my own responsibility, he said, "The difficulty is the people will likely think you are talking with my approval," and I found that the President felt somewhat embarrased. I said to him, "If you really think that, I will clear it up immediately." Senators know what happened. When I got out to the newspaper boys I said to the boys, "Make it perfectly clear that when I am talking about the President being drafted next year I am talking on my own responsibility—I am not talking with his approval." Then I added what was not true, but I wanted to get it across, "I find the President seems to be greatly displeased with what I have said."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. FESS. Not yet. When I said, "I find the President is displeased with what I have been saying," then the boys said, "Were you called to the White House?" I said, "No; certainly not." They said, "Well, is this a second announcement, second to the Black Hills?" I said, "Why, certainly not." I found, with accumulated questions, that the newspaper boys came to the conclusion that I had been reprimanded, that I had been rebuked; and one of them went to the extent of saying, "Anybody acquainted with Mr. Fess would know that he had a run-in, because he was flushed in the face."

It was all amusing, and while it was getting the thing across that I aimed to put across, I did not mean to pay the price for it that I had to pay by having it said that I was rebuked, or that I was censured or reprimanded, for there was not an element of that in it whatever.

Now I yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator said a moment ago that he stated what was not true when he declared that the President was displeased.

Mr. FESS. I said, "I find that the President is greatly displeased." I have just said that I found nothing of the sort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator said that he stated that, but that it was not true. The Senator has had a good deal to say about the newspapers, and now I would like to know whether the stories in the newspapers were true that the Senator, when he left the White House, looked despondent, dejected, depressed, distressed, and despairing.

Mr. FESS. All of those things were said.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. All of those things were said?

Mr. FESS. And I was just as despondent as I am this minute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator says that he was not speaking with the approval of the President. I would like to ask him if he is speaking with the approval of the President now.

Mr. FESS. I am not. I speak altogether upon my own responsibility.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then the Senator is liable to be called to the White House again and reprimanded.

Mr. FESS. I was not called to the White House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is liable to be reprimanded the first time he goes down to the White House to get a job for somebody.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question to clear up a question in my own mind.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator mind telling the Senate whether the reports that came out were true that when the Senator had his conference with the President, and when the President upbraided him, or reprimanded him, or chastised him——

Mr. FESS. When the newspapers said that he did.

Mr. HARRISON. That he hit him on the wrist, and told him not to do it any more?

Mr. FESS. We all not only understand the Senator from Mississippi, but we greatly appreciate the humor that always underlies everything that he says.

Mr. President, I had not intended saying anything about the rebuke said to have been administered in connection with the question of drafting the President. But I do repeat this, and I want the country to know it, that I should not regard it as a mark of insincerity, or dishonor, or any breach of faith, or a lowering in any degree of character, if President Coolidge should accept should the convention at Kansas City tender him the nomination. I do not take that view of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. That does not mean that I think that the President does not mean what he says, because I well know that he does mean what he says.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What force does the Senator give to the declaration of the President, repeated over and over again, that he does not choose to run in 1928?

Mr. FESS. I give the same force that I give to the statement of the Vice President that he is not a candidate for the Presidency. That does not mean that he could not accept the nomination without discredit or dishonor, and nobody else believes that except those who are afraid that he will be nominated.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the present President has a record upon which the country looks with favor. If the convention should decide to tender President Coolidge the nomination, I do not know whether he would accept it or not. He might refuse to accept it; but he certainly could accept it without any breach of honor and without any bad faith.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the President does not take that view of the matter, because he reprimanded and corrected the Senator from Ohio for the expression of that opinion.

Mr. FESS. The Senator can put his own interpretation on the words of the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the Senator's interpretation of the President's attitude?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio has stated over and over that in his judgment President Coolidge does not want to continue after March 4, 1929, as President. President Coolidge is certainly tired of the office he is holding. I do not admit that the mere decision or conviction that he wants to quit would be inconsistent with an acceptance of the nomination if it should be tendered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator feels, notwithstanding all that he has stated, and notwithstanding the President's repeated declaration, that the President is just as free to accept the nomination as if he had said nothing?

Mr. FESS. Without a doubt, Mr. President. If the convention shall tender President Coolidge the nomination, when the world knows he does not want it, when he is not seeking it, when he can not be charged with corralling the delegates to force it, when he has made it clear that he does not want it, if the people of this country wanted him to have it, he could accept it without any dishonor whatever; there is no doubt of that. Our friends on the other side are so fearful that it will be tendered and he will accept it that they are trying to make it appear that it would be dishonorable, an act of bad faith, if he should accept the nomination. In my judgment, there would not be any breach of honor in his acceptance of the nomination, because the President has made it perfectly clear that he does not want the office again.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator feel that he is in accord with the President in the opinion he has just expressed?

Mr. FESS. Oh, the Senator should not attempt to involve me in trying to involve the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not trying to involve the President.

Mr. FESS. The President does his own speaking. I know nothing more than his words express. I do not want the Senator to ask me whether I think the President thinks of it as I do. The Senator knows as much about that as I do. I am simply speaking of the code of honor, which would allow the President to accept an office that he does not want if it is tendered to him when he does not seek it. There would be no dishonor; and if the nomination shall be tendered to him when he does not seek it, he will be so overwhelmingly elected that the Democrats will look a long time for a leader who will stand equal to him.

Now, Mr. President, as to this resolution, I can not vote for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator goes into that, may I ask him a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator believe that when the President said "I do not choose to run" he meant "I will not accept the nomination if tendered me"?

Mr. FESS. I do not think the two things are at all the same. I have never talked to the President about the wording of his statement. I have gotten it direct that he means what he says, and my conclusion is that the President wants to leave the office. I am talking about whether a man like the President, called by the people, although determined not to continue, would be in dishonor if he should yield to the call of the people. I say that he would not, and that is saying nothing about what the President himself wants to do.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator thinks, then, he left the door open, so that if he should be nominated, he could accept?

Mr. FESS. That is the Democratic interpretation.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the Senator's interpretation?

Mr. FESS. My friend from Mississippi is very fearful that the door will be kept open.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am not fearful at all.

Mr. FESS. All the Democrats are fearful, including not only Senators but the New York Times and the great Democratic papers, which would be very glad to see our friend the Governor of New York the candidate of the Democratic Party.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator tell us what his interpretation of the language used by the President is?

Mr. FESS. The President has stated, in his language, in his formal statement, that he does not choose to run in 1928. I do not propose to comment upon his statement. I let the Senator do his own commenting, and make his own interpretation. All I say is that, in the light of that statement, to my mind meaning that he does not want to run in 1928, in case the convention should tender him the nomination when he does not want it, when he does not seek it, when he has made it known to everybody that he does not want it, there would be no dishonor in his accepting it.

There is a chance, I will say to my friend from Mississippi, that the convention might reach the point where they would want to tender the nomination to the President. Then whether he would accept it or not would be a different thing. I do not know. But I do not see how anyone could decline it if tendered in that way. That is only my own opinion, however.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may I read the Senator just three lines of what George Washington said on that subject?

Mr. FESS. On what subject?

Mr. HEFLIN. Exactly what the Senator is talking about, declining to run. He stated in his farewell address that he felt that—

> I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

He did not say he did not choose to run. He said he had formed a resolution not to run, and that he would not even be considered for the office.

Mr. FESS. In case he had been nominated and tendered the office after he had made that statement, it would have meant dishonor, would it, for him to have accepted it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FESS. No; it would not.

Mr. HEFLIN. The position he took was for the good of the country. He did not think a President ought to have more than two terms. He realized that he was setting a precedent that was good and was for the good of the country.

Mr. FESS. It is a gratuitous statement that he did not think a President ought to have more than two terms. I challenge the Senator to show a single line in anything that Washington ever said that would indicate that he did not think a President should have more than two terms.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator think that it would be pretty harsh treatment for a Republican President publicly to state twice that he had no intention of being a candidate to succeed himself, and thus to entice, so to speak, various rival candidates into the field, as, for instance, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the Senator from Kansas, and other Republican candidates for the Presidency at this time, and then afterwards, after they and their friends had carried on extensive campaigns, and perhaps very costly campaigns in a pecuniary sense, at the last moment, when the convention met, to accept the Republican nomination to the Presidency?

Mr. FESS. That long hypothetical inquiry involves the President doing something himself, planning a campaign, which everybody knows is not true. He is not doing anything of the kind. Suppose the campaign goes on, as it will go on up to the meeting of the convention, and the convention decides, no matter what has been said in the campaigning of candidates, that it will turn to the President, because they will conduct the campaign upon the administration as the main argument upon which to go to the people. Why is it that the President would be in dishonor when he has nothing whatever to do with it? Does the Senator mean that under those circumstances, where a convention would tender the nomination, it might be by unanimous vote of the convention, it would be dishonorable to those who had failed to be nominated for him to accept it?

Mr. BRUCE. I think it would be bad faith. The Senator recollects that when the honored McKinley, from his own State, went to a Republican convention as a friend and adherent of John Sherman, and the convention attempted to substitute his name for that of Sherman, he rose and declared that he would consider himself dishonored if, after coming to that convention under the circumstances he had, he were to accept a nomination to the Presidency from it.

Mr. FESS. McKinley's language was even stronger than that. He said he came pledged to the candidacy of John Sherman, an Ohio man, and he would rather be taken home in his coffin than to break that pledge. But let me say to the Senator that McKinley was a delegate who was elected on a pledge for a candidate who was before the convention.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator's point is that the unanimous overpowering call of a presidential convention is sufficient to dissolve any personal obligation that a man owes to his own statements of his intentions.

Mr. FESS. Certainly. The convention would desire to nominate the best man for the country. They can not nominate more than one. They must make a difference between this one and that one, and if a convention delegate can not vote for somebody who can win and upon whose record we are going to run without dishonoring him. I do not know the code of honor or the code of ethics of the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. All I say is, if I know the code of honor, that Secretary Hoover would have bitter cause to complain of the President, the Senator's colleague [Mr. WILLIS] would have bitter cause to complain of him, Mr. Lowden would have bitter cause to complain of him, and every other Republican candidate for the Presidency at the present time, too, if, after he had been prompted by the President's own words to become a candidate, with all the loss of time and expenditure of money that such a candidacy involves, the President were to accept another nomination to the Presidency.

Mr. FESS. The interest of Democrats in the candidacy of President Coolidge is in reverse ratio to their success or wishes of success. This tremendous outbreak of those Senators is only a measure of their fear that what I am saying will come true, and they are trying to put it on the basis of dishonor. I state that there is not a scintilla of dishonor in politics, in ethics, in what not, if any man is tendered the nomination without his seeking it when he is known not to want it. If after this is known he is tendered the nomination and accepts it, to accept it under those circumstances is no dishonor.

Mr. BRUCE. Was not the nomination tendered to McKinley when John Sherman was a candidate?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no. There was simply a vote in the Ohio delegation that they were ready to tender it to him and break away from John Sherman, and he did not want it.

Mr. BRUCE. As a matter of fact, there was a demonstration in the convention, if my memory is not at fault, though the human memory is a very unreliable organ, which indicated as plainly as anything could indicate that the convention wanted to nominate McKinley. Of course, it is inconceivable that under those circumstances John Sherman himself would not have been generous enough to release McKinley, and I think it is not unlikely, if the secret history of the whole transaction were known, that he proffered himself as ready to release him; but McKinley in effect said, "No; I came here as the supporter and adherent of John Sherman. To him my scrupulous good faith is due, and I would consider myself a dishonored man if I were to accept the nomination." Indeed, as I recollect, he went so far as to say, "If the nomination is actually tendered to me, I will decline it."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in 1880, in the convention James A. Garfield nominated John Sherman in one of the most eloquent addresses delivered in any political convention in our history. The day before he made that nominating speech the delegates were in a fight on the floor of the convention over the adoption of the unit rule of the convention. The question was whether each delegate in a State delegation could vote his own view or whether the majority of the delegates would vote the delegation. Garfield stood on a chair, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will recall, in the midst of that convention and made an open fight on the floor of the convention and reversed the action of the committee, and made himself immediately one of the strongest figures in the convention. Up to that time he was not considered as a candidate. On the very first ballot there was an attempt to inject Garfield's name. He declined it. Then later others, and still others, voted for him, and finally on the thirty-seventh ballot Garfield was nominated. Was there any dishonor on the part of Garfield in going to the convention and presenting John Sherman's name and standing by him, and yet, when the convention turned to Garfield, for him to accept it? Was there any dishonor in that?

Mr. BRUCE. I was not referring to Garfield. I was referring to McKinley.

Mr. FESS. I know the Senator referred to McKinley, but I am referring to a second incident and that is the one involving Garfield. If the Senator believes that Garfield in 1880 was subject to criticism, that he committed a breach of honor, then he and I do not agree.

Mr. BRUCE. In my opinion Garfield did a good many things that McKinley would not have done, and the Senator knows why I say that. He is familiar with his political history.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Ohio regard the conduct of Mr. Garfield as exemplary, going to the convention pledged to a man and nominating him, and then taking the nomination himself?

Mr. FESS. I regard Garfield's conduct as perfectly in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if in his nomination speech to-day of the President for a third term he does not feel that he is doing an injustice to his colleague from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who is a candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. FESS. No injustice whatever. I am speaking upon my own responsibility and I hope with the approval of my colleague.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator believe that before Garfield accepted the nomination, either he personally or some of his agents or lieutenants or close friends in the delegation were in intimate touch with John Sherman, and that John Sherman withdrew and acceded to the nomination of Garfield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator believe the same thing of McKinley, that he was approached by friends of John Sherman and told that Sherman would not stand in the way of his nomination; and yet, like the strong good man he was, refused to accept the nomination?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Maryland answers his own question.

Mr. BRUCE. That is the safest way.

Mr. FESS. Most Senators are well acquainted with what Ohio does. We participate in all national conventions and the record ever since the Civil War, and even before that, is not to be ashamed of. Out of the entire list of Presidents, only eight of them have come from the State of Ohio.

Mr. BRUCE. I believe some one once said that some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and some are born in Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. That is true. The distinguished Senator from Maryland once in a flight of oratory said that there is much greatness in the West, most of which had gone from the East, all of which had to go on trunk lines, and all of which went across Ohio, and that naturally some of the greatness en route rubbed off in that State.

Now, as to the resolution I do not like the language:

That any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise—

I do not object to that word—

unpatriotic—

I do object to that. I do not believe that anyone who thinks of the possibilities that might obtain at the close of a second term would say that there are not some circumstances where a third term might be entered upon without being unpatriotic. It seems to me, even though we believe in the wisdom of limiting the tenure to two terms, there might arise cases where it would be a patriotic service to accept office for a third term.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if the words to which he objects were stricken out would he support the resolution?

Mr. FESS. There are some other words in the resolution which I should desire to have stricken out, and then I would support it. I want the word "unpatriotic" stricken out; nor do I want to vote for a resolution containing the words "fraught with peril to our free institutions." I would not object to voting for it as a general statement, but I desire to make exceptions. There may arise cases where the peril would come in not departing from the tradition. If that clause could be so worded as to be a general statement, with exceptions left open, I should not oppose it. I, however, would not vote for any resolution that included the second resolving clause.

The Senator from Wisconsin, who offered this resolution, expressed the idea in the speech he made when the resolution was first under consideration, and he made it perfectly clear that one of the reasons for the introduction of the resolution is a fear that the President might be a candidate under certain circumstances, and he thinks the resolution, if adopted, would at least assist in preventing that happening. I would not vote for any suggestion of that kind at all; and it seems to me that Senators who are acting from the standpoint not of mere politics but of a general principle in government would hesitate to favor that particular clause of the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After listening to the interpretation which the Senator from Ohio placed upon the statements made by the President of the United States on August 2 and December 6, I desire to say that, if that interpretation is sound, certainly the second paragraph should be stricken from the resolution.

The Senator from Ohio has stated that it is his conviction that the President of the United States has left himself in a position where he could accept the nomination if tendered. If that be the proper interpretation to place upon the President's statement, it would certainly be most inappropriate for the Senate of the United States to commend the President's observance of the anti-third-term tradition if in fact his statements do not warrant the conclusion that he intends to observe that tradition.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Wisconsin that my statement was to the effect that the President has left himself in a position by his statement to accept another nomination for the Presidency is unwarranted. That would ascribe to the President the purpose of making a statement that would be open to two interpretations. No Senator who has listened to me to-day would make such a statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After listening to the interpretation of the Senator from Ohio of the statements made by the President of the United States August 3 and December 6 as to his being a candidate in 1928, I wish to say that if the construction placed upon the President's language by the Senator from Ohio is correct, then I agree that the second paragraph should be stricken from the resolution following the President's supplementary statement of December 6, 1927, because, following that statement, the interpretation generally placed upon it was that the President had completely and conclusively eliminated himself as a presidential possibility and that his nomination by the convention was foreclosed by his attitude. Now, the Senator from Ohio takes the position that the President of the United States in making that supplemental statement has made it in such a way that he can accept the nomination if it shall be tendered to him, and that that statement does not in any wise preclude his acceptance of the nomination.

The point I am trying to make is that if the Senator's interpretation is the correct one, if the Senator from Ohio, following his chastisement at the White House, is in a position officially to interpret the language of the President better than those who have previously placed the interpretation upon it, then I say the second resolve of the resolution should be stricken from it.

If the Senator from Ohio will be so kind as to permit me further to trespass upon his time, I should like to say also that in drawing the resolution, and including the last resolving clause in it to the effect "that the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President," I accepted the interpretation placed upon the President's supplementary statement of December 6 that most of the political observers, the newspapers, and the public generally placed upon it. I felt that if I offered this resolution without the provision commending the President for his action in the observance of the anti-third-term tradition I would be subject to the charge that I did not take his statement as having been made in good faith, but for the purpose of subterfuge and deceit. Therefore, Mr. President, I included that commendation in the resolution; but if the Senator from Ohio, who I am sure everyone will acknowledge is one whose interpretation of the language of the President should be given great weight and consideration, is correct in his statement, and if that be the proper interpretation of the meaning of the President's language, then clearly the final resolving clause should be stricken from the resolution, for, as the Senator from Ohio has interpreted the President's statement, we would be putting ourselves in the position of commending him for something which he had not done.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has given his interpretation of the purpose of the resolution. Of course, it is a commendatory resolution; everybody knows that it is meant to do honor to the President. [Laughter.] There is no question about that. I do not want my language misconstrued. I again state that if the convention were to nominate President Coolidge, which is not at all impossible, then anything that has been said by him, so far as I can interpret the English language, would not foreclose his acceptance of the nomination if it were tendered without his seeking it. That is not the President's language; I am speaking for myself. So far as I can learn from what the President says to me, he wants to leave the office on the 4th of March, 1929; he is tired of the office and does not care to be a candidate, and, I might say, has decided not to be a candidate; but as to the question of honor, I can not see that there would be any dishonor in his accepting the nomination if tendered under the circumstances.

Mr. President, when the time comes I shall vote to strike out the second resolving clause.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has made a statement which I have heard nobody else in the country make. He tells us that when the President made the statement, as he did on two occasions, it was his opinion that the President did not have under consideration at all the anti-third-term tradition. I understand that statement to have been made by the Senator from Ohio. Am I correct?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, let me state it a little differently. I am morally certain that the third-term idea had nothing whatever to do with the President's statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if the President said anything to him that would lead him to that conclusion?

Mr. FESS. I am not repeating anything that the President said to me, and nobody would ask to quote the President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the Senator to make that statement very positively. It is the only time I have ever heard it made by anybody. It is my opinion that the President did have in mind the anti-third-term tradition and that he declined to be a candidate because of that tradition. I think the Senator's statement is not fair to the President.

Mr. FESS. I think if the Senator will make a little investigation he may have that opinion modified.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FESS. I yield the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I have listened to this entertaining debate and conversation for an hour or two. I merely desire to make one or two observations. When the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] assumes that the Democratic side of the Chamber is tremendously exercised about the possible candidacy of President Coolidge he is hugging to his breast another of the many delusions he habitually embraces.

I have been conjuring in my mind for the reason why the Senator so persistently keeps before the country the idea that the President will really run to succeed himself, and I am wondering if the Senator is the duly appointed or if he is only the self-anointed John the Baptist of the savior of the Republican Party. [Laughter.]

I followed with great interest a large number of stories in the press of a few months ago attributed to the White House spokesman. We all wondered for a long time who the White House spokesman might be, but about the time inquiry became acute the White House spokesman disappeared from the face of the earth, and the place that knew him once knew him no more. As I have thought of this conversation in the Senate to-day, I have wondered whether the Senator from Ohio is really the White House spokesman on this occasion.

Mr. FESS. Upon no occasion am I the White House spokesman.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then, I wonder why the Senator speaks so often for the White House and gives us the inner consciousness of the President, even to the extent of saying that the President in his declaration did not at all have in mind the ancient and honored tradition of this country that no man ought to run for a third term.

So far as I can make out from the Senator's discussion, this is what he said: "The President said, 'I do not choose to run,' but the President did not say he would not accept a nomination; and he is as free to accept that nomination to-day as he would have been if he had never made any statement at all." That is to say, all that the President said was a string of ciphers without an integer attached at either end of the string; and all that the President meant was, "I do not inject myself into this campaign, but if you want to nominate me, all right; I will take it."

That is the position in which the President is put by his friend and his confidant! If the President is content with that, well and good; but if the President really meant what he said, after the next interview with the Senator from Ohio there will be no doubt about the Senator's face being flushed.

The Senator tells us that the Democrats are terribly interested in the possible candidacy of the President to succeed himself, and tells us that the President will sweep the country, and that his election is assured. I want to remind the Senator of the old Biblical phrase:

> Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.

This is a good time to win conventions by word of mouth long in advance of the canvassing of the ballots; but I am wondering why the Senator so persistently insists that the President may be nominated, that the convention will likely enough turn to him in the last analysis. It seems to me that that is the doctrine of despair. The Senator, having surveyed the field, having looked them all over, feels in his heart that the only chance they have to win at all is to get away from the entire bunch, and trusts that they may get away even by accepting the President against his protest.

I protest against that. I protest in the name of the Senator's own colleague [Mr. WILLIS]. I protest in the name of the distinguished leader upon the other side of the Senate [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. REED of Missouri. When I get through with the list. I protest in the name of that great English statesman, Mr. Hoover. I protest in the name of that great dirt farmer, Mr. Lowden. I protest in the name of the great Republican Party; for, with all its faults, it really does seem to me that it is not absolutely forced to nominate one man because it has not any other man capable of filling the position.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if Ohio can nominate the candidate, he will be an Ohio man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Which one?

Mr. FESS. WILLIS.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am not so sure; because, while the Senator says that now, he has already announced the doctrine that it is perfectly proper and perfectly honorable for a man to go to a convention pledged to a candidate, selected to nominate him, and then to carry away the prize himself; to sit in the councils of a man, to know all of the machinery that he is employing and all of the influences to which he is appealing in order to gain support, to appear as his champion, and then to turn upon him and take away from him the thing he sought, and take it over to himself.

If that be the Senator's philosophy, then I do not know but that he may appear in the convention loudly proclaiming the virtues and praising the pulchritude of his illustrious colleague, and have all the time in his heart the hope that this despairing convention, in the last throes of its agony, may turn to him, and that he can carry away the nomination. I do not know. I would always have trusted the Senator implicitly until to-day; but after to-day he could never sit in my councils if I were trying to organize a fight, for I would not know but that the next day he would employ every secret he there learned, every plan he there became acquainted with, for his own emolument and his own profit.

I think the Senator does not really mean what he said. I do not think the ordinary ward politician would ever be guilty of going to a convention pledged to a candidate and acting as his manager and then seeking or accepting the nomination himself. I do not think the philosophy taught here to-day is on a level with a very low order of politics. I think it is beneath that level.

As far as the President is concerned, if the "White House spokesman" who has vanished in thin air, or the White House spokesman who appears here to-day, see fit to keep him before the people, it does not concern the Democratic Party much; but it does concern those gentlemen who, upon the strength of it, have thrown their fortunes into the arena and really we have not much interest in that. They are perfectly welcome to fight it out among themselves. But the statement made by the Senator from Ohio to-day demands a decisive answer. One who is so close to the President that he consults with him about his political future, one so distinguished in his party and standing so high among his fellow Senators as does the Senator from Ohio, declares that the President is in no manner bound by anything he said, and that he is as much a receptive candidate as anybody else is a receptive candidate; that is to say, he will take the nomination if you give it to him.

Mr. FESS. I did not say anything of that sort.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator said that in his opinion, if the convention renominated the President, he could accept the nomination with honor.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I said that, and I repeat it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Now, does the Senator mean to say that he will accept it? Let us have a "yes" or "no" answer to that.

Mr. FESS. I do not know.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator does not know?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. Then we have been talking a long time to no purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not let this opportunity go by without defending the President. President Coolidge needs defense.

He has told us that he does not choose to run. As far as I am concerned, I will excuse him. [Laughter.] The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has spoken for an hour and a half, and he has conveyed the idea to Senators, and it will go out to the country, that the President might run; that he might be nominated; and that he might accept the nomination.

I think we would put the President in a bad attitude if we should let that kind of an argument influence us here to-day. I think we ought to vote as nearly unanimously as possible to pass this resolution, and show the President that we accept his statement in good faith; that we do not put the interpretation on his language that the Senator from Ohio does; that we are backing him up, showing him that the Senate by an almost unanimous vote is willing for him to stick to his statement that he does not choose to run.

Why should the Senator from Ohio want to make a man change his mind when he himself says he does not choose to run? The President probably saw that difficulties would arise, even though it was insisted by his friends that he should run. He did not want to go up against the Democratic Party in the next race. I do not know what considerations may have moved him; but something moved him when he was in the far West, when farmers were calling on him from every quarter of that section. He decided one day that he did not choose to run. He announced it to the country. He came back to the Capital. When the national committee of his own party met, he reiterated that he did not choose to run. He never did say that he would not run and that he would not accept the nomination, but he used an old, familiar term that had long been used in New England, "I do not choose to run"; and they tell us that that means "I will not run," and that it means "I would not accept the nomination if tendered me."

There are so many constructions put upon that statement. Let us decide with the President here to-day that he meant that he did not choose to run, and say by this resolution that we do not choose for him to run. [Laughter.] Why not do that, Mr. President?

The Senator from Ohio said that Washington did not have in mind this third-term proposition. He had nothing else in mind; and he did not announce to his countrymen that he did not "choose" to run, or that he "preferred" not to run. He said to them:

> It appears to me proper * * * that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

He made it as strong as he could make it. He knew that his act would be looked on as a precedent, and it has been. To this good day this time-honored custom has been observed. Why should not the Senate, the greatest lawmaking body in the world, go upon record as commending the custom Washington set, and which has been observed for 125 years?

Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate longer, and will not. I am going to vote for this resolution as it stands.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he intends to conclude his remarks to-day without any comment whatever upon what he knows must have been one element in the President's choice, namely, the certainty that Al Smith would be the Democratic nominee?

Mr. HEFLIN. I could not attend to that subject properly in the time that we have left to-day. [Laughter.]

SHENANDOAH NATIONAL PARK

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I report back favorably from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys without amendment Senate bill 2656, to establish a minimum area for the Shenandoah National Park for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes, and I submit a report thereon (No. 278). I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the minimum area for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service in the Shenandoah National Park, the establishment of which is provided for by the act of Congress approved May 22, 1926 (44 Stat. 616), be, and the same is hereby, established as 327,000 acres, and so much of the said act of May 22, 1926, as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.
> SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease lands within the Shenandoah National Park and Great Smoky Mountains National Park for periods not exceeding two years, upon such conditions as he may in his discretion deem proper, to persons and educational or religious institutions occupying same or who had or claim to have had some interest in the title to the same prior to the establishment of the park.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the object of the bill is to reduce the acreage required in the Shenandoah National Park, as provided in the act passed during the last Congress. The act which was passed required a minimum of 521,000 acres. This bill requires a minimum of 327,000 acres. It has been ascertained that in the 525,000 acres contemplated to be acquired under the former measure, a great deal of valuable land would be included. I am very anxious to see this bill passed, as the Legislature of Virginia is in session and contemplates appropriating a million dollars to purchase the land for the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COOSA RIVER BRIDGE, ALABAMA

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on last Monday the Senate passed Senate bill 2257, providing for the building of a bridge over the Coosa River. There has now come over from the House an identical bill—House bill 7902—which is before the Committee on Commerce. In order to obviate duplication, and to get quick action, I move that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 7902, when I shall ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration. It is a bill (H. R. 7902) granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.

The motion was agreed to; and there being on objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUMMI INDIAN RESERVATION ROAD

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, from the Committee on Indian Affairs I report favorably without amendment Senate bill 1478, to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a road on the Lummi Indian Reservation, Wash., and I submit a report thereon (No. 279). I ask for immediate consideration of the bill. It is a local measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That not to exceed the sum of $20,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the completion and graveling of the road which has been partially constructed by Whatcom County across Lummi Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That the proper authorities of the State of Washington or the county of Whatcom shall agree to maintain such road free of expense to the United States.

Mr. JONES. The bill is approved by the department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. SACKETT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 473, granting the consent of Congress to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River. A Senate bill identical in form has passed the Senate, and I want the Senate to act on this House bill.

There being no objection, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION—RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, February 10, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 9, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast created us wilt not leave us alone. Thou dost understand our possibilities, and we ask Thee to help us make the best use of ourselves. Surely Thou wilt watch over us until all Thy promises are fulfilled. Purify every desire, cleanse every motive, and deliver us from the throes of weakness and sin. O sin, the monster—how it hurts him who cherishes it as well as the one against whom it rages! Clear the way and make firm and steadfast our footsteps that we may prove ourselves worthy of Thy daily providential care. Keep our minds free from evil and our hearts from guile, and may we indulge ourselves in the great hope that righteousness is destined to cover the wide earth even as the waters cover the seas. When the curtain of the day is drawn may we have no regrets, but peace, sweet peace, the gladdest and the happiest possession of earth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2996. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare a medal with appropriate emblems and inscriptions commemorative of the achievements of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh;

S. J. Res. 5. Joint resolution to grant a preference to the wives and minor children of alien declarants in the issuance of immigration visas; and

S. J. Res. 62. Joint resolution providing for the cooperation of the United States in the Pacific Southwest Exposition in commemoration of the landing of the Spanish padres in the Pacific Southwest and the opening of the Long Beach, Calif., world port.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved May 25, 1926."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7013. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks, to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9136) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. HARRIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5583. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River, at or near Presidio, Tex.;

TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. SNELL, chairman of the Committee on Rules, reported the following rule for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 112

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 18, proposing an amendment to the Constitution. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the House concurrent resolution and shall continue not to exceed five hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the House concurrent resolution, the House concurrent resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the House concurrent resolution for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the House concurrent resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the House concurrent resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short announcement. This resolution for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 18 provides five hours of general debate, but if it develops during the discussion of resolution that we need more time we will ask to have the rule amended and give more time. We appreciate this is a most important matter, and we want the House to have ample time to discuss it freely and fully from all sides.

I have been asked when the rule will probably be called up. I may say I will give the House, as near as possible, a week's notice before it is called up. I do not believe it will be called up next week on account of some other matters that will interfere and as several Members have requested that it be put over to a later date.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the resolution about?

Mr. SNELL. It is a resolution providing for the consideration of the White-Norris constitutional amendment.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for eight minutes on the subject of submarines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 27]

Ackerman	Douglas, Ariz.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Purnell
Adkins	Doyle	Kendall	Quayle
Anthony	Roy G. Fitzgerald	Kindred	Reed, Ark.
Auf der Heide	Foss	Kunz	Robsion, Ky.
Beck, Pa.	French	Larsen	Romjue
Begg	Gallivan	Leatherwood	Sanders, N. Y.
Bell	Gilbert	Lehlbach	Sirovich
Bohn	Glynn	Linthicum	Steagall
Boies	Graham	Maas	Strong, Pa.
Britten	Griffin	Mead	Strother
Burdick	Haugen	Michaelson	Sullivan
Campbell	Hickey	Monast	Taylor, Tenn.
Celler	Hogg	Morrow	Tucker
Clancy	Houston	Norton, N. J.	Updike
Connolly, Pa.	Howard, Okla.	O'Connell	Weller
Cooper, Ohio	Hughes	O'Connor, N. Y.	White, Me.
Curry	Hull, Tenn.	Parks	Williamson
Davey	Igoe	Porter	Wingo
Dickstein	Jacobstein	Prall	Winter

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty-six Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. TILSON, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

COMPLETION AND REPAIR OF CUSTOMS BUILDINGS IN PORTO RICO

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9363) to provide for the completion and repair of customs buildings in Porto Rico be rereferred from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, this bill pertains merely to the affairs of the people of Porto Rico. The construction of these buildings is to be paid out of the revenues of Porto Rico and has nothing to do with continental United States. While the bill technically may be within the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee, I shall not object, with the understanding that the rereference is without prejudice, to which I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania consents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill just reported be rereferred from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on Insular Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN PORTO RICAN TAXPAYERS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 754) for the relief of certain Porto Rican taxpayers be rereferred from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object simply for the purpose of stating the situation. This bill also pertains entirely to the affairs of the people of Porto Rico. It is an amendment of an act originally passed upon by the Committee on Insular Affairs. I have consulted with members of the committee on both sides of the House and there seems to be no objection to this rereference, with the same understanding as was had with respect to the other bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

SUBMARINES

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a short editorial on submarines from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

SUBMARINES IN SEA LANES

It may be necessary for Congress to prohibit the maneuvering of underseas boats in commercial lanes. There are hundreds of miles of water space within easy reach of the coasts that are free at all times from commercial traffic, in which submarine tests could be made with safety.

The location of the appalling accident to the S–4, which has resulted in destroying the lives of two score or more officers and men, is in a narrow channel constantly traversed by merchant ships and in the course of vessels of the Coast Guard.

There is no way in which a surface vessel can locate an undersea boat except when the submarine shows her periscope or conning tower. In the case of the S–4 it appears that the commander of the Paulding had no knowledge whatever of the fact that a submarine was anywhere in the vicinity, and it was only when her conning tower appeared above the surface that her presence was even suspected. Then it was too late. The collision was inevitable. No seaman, however expert, can change his course or stop the headway of his ship within a distance less than the length of his hull.

In such circumstances the accident which has brought sorrow to so many homes is reported as "unavoidable." But it could have been prevented if the naval authorities had taken the precaution to direct the commanders of undersea boats to refrain from submerging their vessels near the coast, and especially within commercial lanes in the vicinity of ports.

It is time that steps were taken to stop this unnecessary loss of life. If the naval authorities do not have common sense enough to order submarine tests in unoccupied waters, Congress should direct them to do so.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall try to conclude my remarks as quickly as possible, as I understand that the river and harbor amendment comes up immediately after I conclude. I sought this opportunity this morning to make a short address for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House a very significant statement that I have just received in the way of a letter referring to submarines. Simon Lake, who is given credit for the invention of the submarine, who lives at Milford, Conn., has written me a letter in which he makes the statement that some time ago while at Provincetown, Mass., he was told by certain of those who participated in the rescue of the S–4 that if they had had on this ship the new appliances he had put on other submarines built for other nations that the 38 or 40 of those who lost their lives could have been rescued in one hour. I ask that the Clerk read the letter in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

From the evidence so far attained the loss of the S–4 was due to no fault in the boat itself. It was due to a collision at sea, and since then several other surface ships have been sunk by collision and collisions are going on between surface ships at the rate of several per day, as maritime statistics show, frequently accompanied by very large loss of life. Such losses are so frequent as to be commonplace, and only attract a brief notice in the press; but because those men were not drowned at once, as practically always occurs when surface ships sink with their crews and passengers entrapped, the whole world became interested in the possibility of their rescue. The fact that some of these men were alive for days is to my mind a proof that the submarine is safer than the surface ships. In no other type of ship could men survive 100 feet under water for days. It is unfortunate that the S–4 was not fitted with certain safety features, similar to which were installed in the boats I built for foreign governments some years ago. Had these features been installed on the S–4 I believe, from the information given me by some of the officers in the rescue fleet at Provincetown on a recent visit there, that at least 38 of the 40 men could have been rescued within an hour after the S–4 was sunk.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that is one of the most startling statements I have ever heard with respect to submarines in the Navy for the reason certain naval officers have denied that any new devices with merit have been submitted to the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman who wrote the letter?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Simon Lake, the inventor of submarines. This letter shows that this inventor has supplied new safety appliances to other nations of the world in the construction of submarines. This means that he has been building submarines for other Governments and that our Navy has not seen fit to adopt his suggestions. It means by inference that the United States Navy has not considered his suggestions as being necessary, yet foreign nations have adopted these new appliances for safety. It seems to me if we had the right person at the head of this department in our Navy that our submarines would have been fitted with new safety appliances, and that the 38, if not all of those who lost their lives in the disaster, might have been saved.

Mr. Speaker, a report has been given out by the press that the special committee of naval officers appointed by the Navy has held its hearing and made its report, but that this report has not been given to the public, and the Secretary of the Navy makes the statement that he does not know when it will be given to the public. I want to say to you here and now that if this committee that has made the special investigation has not consulted men with the same qualifications as Simon Lake, the inventor of submarines, and has not considered who was responsible for not providing safety devices, and has not ascertained whether new ideas along that line have been submitted to the Navy from time to time—I say now that their report will be nothing more and nothing less than a whitewash of the Navy.

Everyone knows that when a committee of this kind is appointed it is its duty to go into every phase of the situation, and the point uppermost in the minds of the American people to-day is why did not the Navy and those charged with the responsibility require the kind of safety devices that were then known, as testified to by Mr. Lake in his letter, which would have brought about the rescue when the accident occurred?

I say to you the time has come for us to take some action in a matter of this kind. I suggested some time ago, and introduced a bill that called for a survey of conditions in southern waters for the relocation of a base to be used in the training of submarine crews. Everyone knows that our submarine training activities should be taken out of the ship-travel lanes and be put at some place where they would not be subject to disasters like the one that sunk the S–4. Southern waters are warm and much clearer; therefore something should be done at once in this connection.

I do not know whether it is going to be possible to get a resolution passed along this line or not, but I do say that if another such accident occurs in the travel lanes of the ocean whereby 40 or 50 men are sent to their death in a submarine accident, then there will be those in the Nation who will feel that the Secretary of the Navy ought to be prosecuted criminally—and he ought to be summarily removed if he does not attend to this work in a proper manner. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Can the gentleman tell us what other naval powers have done in the way of providing safety devices?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am glad the gentleman from Texas has asked that question. I have a statement of a German sailor who was in a German submarine lost at the bottom of the sea for a day or so; afterwards it was located, and this ship was raised in sufficient time to effect the rescue of all of those in the ship.

SAYS GERMAN DEVICE COULD HAVE RAISED "S–4"—FORMER GUNNER'S MATE IN KAISER'S NAVY HELPED BUILD SUCCESSFUL SALVAGE CRAFT

In Germany a marine device which would have raised the sunken S–4 from the bottom of Provincetown Harbor probably within 48 hours under the most adverse conditions and would have made possible the saving of her crew of 40 men, was built and used successfully more than 10 years ago, according to Ernest Hermann Hagemann, now of Hartford, and during the World War artilleristen maat (gunner's mate) in the German Navy.

The craft, designed and built for the Government at Wilhelmshaven, Prussia, a large naval base, in 1917, was basically two separate ships with specially constructed hulls joined together by rigid steel beams in such a way that there was space enough between them to allow the floating of undersea boats of the size and type in use at that time. A giant crane was mounted between the two vessels equipped with lifting machinery powerful enough to bring sunken craft to the surface even if partly filled with water.

According to Mr. Hagemann's story, after he had gone through a harrowing experience in a disabled submarine at the bottom of the North Sea, and subsequently had been declared unfit for undersea service, he was transferred to the engineering branch of the navy as an assistant draftsman late in 1916.

Shortly after that, with a number of naval architects and engineers, he was sent to the shipyards of the firm of Blum & Foss, at Wilhelmshaven, where the "submarine lift boat" was to be built.

The first type which was evolved was similar to a second one built later in the year, after a period of experiment, except that it had three arched cranes for lifting instead of one. Each of the two halves of the lift boat was completely fitted out as though it were a separate ship, Mr. Hagemann continues. In addition, there was on each vessel the machinery and air pumps necessary for diving. The contrivance was approximately 18 meters (59 feet) long and of about 1,500 gross tons.

EQUIPPED WITH HOOKS

After this idea had been worked out all submarines were equipped with properly mounted hooks, to which divers could attach the steel cables for lifting. In practice and experimental work the submarines could be raised sometimes in an hour, sometimes two or three.

The first time the lift boat was called out for actual use Mr. Hagemann and the other draftsmen and engineers who had worked on her and on the first one which was built were aboard. It was late in 1917.

A school submarine from the Heligoland base, with a double crew on board, had submerged and failed to come up some distance out from the island. In the meantime, according to Mr. Hagemann, a storm came up and after it had to some extent abated the sunken submarine was found lying on a sandbar about 35 feet under water. In all she was on the bottom 36 hours, but only a few hours were required to bring her to the surface once the lift boat commenced operations, and her crew was saved.

During the years he served in the navy, Mr. Hagemann said, there were a number of other cases where the lift boat was able to rescue sunken and disabled submarines without loss of life among their crews. At the time of the sinking of the S–51 in Block Island Sound, two years ago, he said, he was surprised that no such device had been evolved by the United States Navy, and was doubly so when the sinking of the S–4 brought to light the fact that none has since been developed.

Mr. Hagemann came to Hartford four and a half years ago from Germany because of the postwar economic depression. He is now a cabinetmaker in the employ of the L. F. Dettenborn Woodworking Co. He was born in Wilhelmshaven in 1891. Following his graduation from "real gymnasium," similar to the American trade school, he joined the navy and during the war served in a number of important naval engagements.

In 1916, after he had been for some years stationed at the Heligoland naval base, he was ordered to Kiel, where he took a course in the submarine school for six weeks. Immediately after this he was assigned to the U–67.

I want to put this statement in the RECORD for the reason that this German boy sent me a telegram and offered to come to Washington if his expenses were paid and tell this Government how this German rescue ship was constructed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. [Applause.]

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 8, 1928.

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the message of the Senate announcing its agreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 700) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes."

Attest:

(Signed) EDWIN P. THAYER, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be complied with.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I received a communication in my mail this morning from the American Indian Defense Association, and it was stated in that communication that "Senate bill 700 has been recalled from the House and a motion to reconsider it is pending in the Senate." Apparently this association has given its orders. The Senate is asking for the recall of this legislation introduced by Representative MORROW, of New Mexico.

Has any Member of this body or the body at the other end of the Capitol such power? Could any of us dictate the policy of this House in the manner of this association?

Whether they are right or wrong in this instance no individual, no group of men or women, no association should be able to force their opinions or policies down the throats of any Member, and God forbid that the weight of their influence should be felt in any committee of either House or Senate.

The Morrow bill was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House. Mr. Collier, secretary of this association, sat in on these hearings; Mr. CRAMTON offered his amendment and was heard by this committee. It is true that his amendment was not accepted in toto, but it was accepted by Mr. MORROW and by the Committee of the Whole when offered by Mr. CRAMTON from the floor.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have felt the full force of the tyrannous action of this association and of the Indian Rights Association in my endeavor to deal justice alike to Indians and whites on the Walker River in my beloved State of Nevada. Here the Paiute Indians live on the Walker River Indian Reservation, where they were driven by United States soldiers in 1859. They have not tilled the self-same soil since the time of Christ, as it is reported the tribes of Cochiti, Santo Domingo, and San Felipi have upon the Middle Rio Grande Valley.

The Walker River Indians learned to till the soil from the white settlers and did not commence the growing of crops on the reservation until 1871. The whites commenced in 1859. They stepped out of the covered wagon into their cabin. They filed on the water of the stream and put it to beneficial use and now have under cultivation over 100,000 acres.

The Indians have 2,023 acres under cultivation. Their primary water right only covers this acreage. I have always insisted that the Indians are entitled to this acreage of primary water rights. The Indian Rights Association have insisted that this right must be doubled. This is unfair. Where these people who are so solicitous in the interest of the Indian have in this instance coerced Congress, in the case of the Walker River, they have, I am forced to believe, browbeaten some officials of the Indian Bureau into accepting their views of the Walker River matter.

I am kindly disposed toward all American Indians. To them I always want to extend a helping hand, to be fair and just, to give them the benefit of the doubt on questionable matters, and at the same time to treat my white brethren with equal justice and to always bear in mind that in the eyes of our Government the white man should be looked on with equal favor as the Indian.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I perhaps would be the one Member in the House that might raise an objection to this message being sent back to the Senate, but having taken part in the legislation, knowing it to be in the interest of the Indians and to be vitally in the interest of my State, if there is any further investigation needed, I take pleasure in withdrawing my objection to its being sent back to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

RIVERS AND HARBORS

To be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers:

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, after line 16, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Harbor improvements: To pay the city of Miami, out of any funds available in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for part reimbursement of the $1,605,000 advanced or loaned to the Government by said city for the improvement of Miami Harbor, as provided under the river and harbor act passed March 3, 1925, in accordance with House Document 516, the sum of $605,000."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, it is, indeed, unfortunate that my good friend and colleague from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is the chairman of this subcommittee. There is no man in this House for whom I have a higher esteem. Some years ago there was a good deal of friction between California and Florida, but joining with them in their fights for relief, and they joining with me, that friction has been swept aside. I do not believe that I am overstating it when I say that if the chairman of the subcommittee were at liberty to do so, he would support my amendment.

I want the attention of this House because I feel that I have a meritorious cause, and I know that I have a meritorious amendment. The facts of the case are as follows:

In 1925 under the river and harbor act, as my colleagues will recall, there was authorized for the deepening of Miami Harbor 25 feet, the sum of $1,605,000. On page 14, section 11, of that bill is found the following proviso:

That whenever local interests shall offer to advance funds for the prosecution of a work of river and harbor improvement, duly adopted and authorized by law, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, receive such funds and expend the same in the immediate prosecution of such work. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to pay, without interest, from appropriations which may be provided by Congress for river and harbor improvement, the money so contributed and expended.

In January, 1926, Miami, Fla., put up $500,000. Due to a local fight, nothing could be done. The local fight was on the turning basin and the kind of docks that they would have, so the Government had $500,000 of our money for more than 12 months without spending a dollar of it. In September, 1926, Miami put up the balance of the fund, making it $1,605,000 on which she is paying 5½ per cent interest. A few weeks after we deposited that fund the hurricane struck Miami, and the city had to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in clearing her streets, removing the débris, reconditioning the sewerage, and if I paint too sorrowful a picture, I am sure that my friends Congressmen FREEMAN, of Connecticut, CHALMERS and MORGAN, of Ohio, STRONG of Pennsylvania, CARTER and SWING, of California, LYON, of North Carolina, MCDUFFIE, of Alabama, and DEAL, of Virginia, who went down there and saw the destruction that was visited on the good people, will say so or that the picture could not be overdrawn.

Facing that condition and with a loss of $78,000,000 in the storm section, Miami now comes to you and asks you to give back to her, not an appropriation, but the money that she advanced to you in good faith. If it were a foreign country like Japan, for whom you voted a million dollars, perchance it would pass without opposition. But, unfortunately, I am appealing to you for your own people; that they may be given the relief they are entitled to. On June 5 of this year—my colleagues, listen to this—those bonds mature, and unless you give this relief Miami will have to reissue bonds and will have to pay between $50,000 and $60,000 additional interest, brokerage, printing, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I say to you that when a city or a municipality is hit so hard by an act of Providence, and by law can only assess a certain millage, and they can only raise a certain amount of taxes, you, my colleagues, will realize the importance of the proposition and give back to Miami her money in order that she may take up those bonds on the 5th day of June of this year and not compel them to pay between $50,000 and $60,000 additional.

Then I want to call you attention to these facts: Miami has expended on that harbor $3,596,373.85. The Government of the United States has spent on that harbor $2,956,000. Miami will have expended, when you shall have returned to her the $605,000, nearly as much as the Government has expended on the harbor.

My colleagues put it in the law that we had to construct the channel, and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN] went over it and saw it. We had to dig the channel across the bay to a depth of 15 feet in order to get our first appropriation. I do not believe that when a city has expended nearly $4,000,000 of her own money and then advanced to the Government $1,605,000 to complete the harbor, you should refuse to give back to her now her money in order that she may meet her obligations.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask the gentleman if this money was not spent originally at the request of the people of Miami? Did she not want to get her work done in advance of other work in connection with rivers and harbors?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That may be so. But I say to you, my friends, as I said before, Miami would not be asking for this now if it were not for that act of Providence over which she had no control. Therefore I want you to be as liberal to her as you are to foreign countries. We advanced the money in good faith. We had nothing to do with the hurricane. We had nothing to do with the cause that makes it necessary to ask that she get back at once all of the money advanced to the Government.

Mr. SNELL. You do not say that we have not lived up to all our legal rights?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. No; I have not said that. Unfortunately Congress can wait 10 years and we are estopped from complaining. General Jadwin has been kind to me.

Mr. SNELL. How much is this?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SNELL. How much is in this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. It is $1,605,000 altogether. Five hundred thousand dollars of that was paid last year, and $500,000 will be paid back this year. Six hundred and five thousand dollars it is now proposed will be paid back next year. But the gentleman is not willing to wait.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I asked about.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I am unwilling to wait, because we are entitled to it, and the city authorities say they can not wait. They must refund those bonds on the 5th of June. I ask you, my colleagues, to take that fact into consideration. If you were in my place, and if it were your city that you were pleading for, a city suffering from a hurricane, you would realize my situation. When the disastrous floods occurred I wired to the President to go the limit, and I promised him that I would back him up when Congress convened. It is true that we might wait 10 years; but, as I say, the city must have the money before June.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that there is no disposition to wait 10 years. It is distinctly understood that the gentleman's city is going to get $500,000 right away.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes. We get it out of this bill. I want to be perfectly fair.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is also distinctly understood that you will get the other $605,000 next year. The gentleman is trying to legislate it on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has again expired.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, may I proceed for five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. As I understand it, the Government next year will refund to Miami the $605,000 you are asking for now. If the House refuses to comply with your request it will cost the city of Miami about $50,000 in interest and other charges.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes; approximately; and the city has no funds to redeem the bonds.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman does not mean to say that it will cost $60,000, does he?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I am talking about the sale of bonds.

Mr. SNELL. It certainly will not cost that much.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I do not want to quibble about it. It is 5½ per cent on $605,000. There is the interest, about $30,000; the brokerage and the printing of the bonds and the expenses of the sale, if you can get a sale for them. I do not want to mislead the House. It is over $30,000.

Mr. SNELL. It is for the improvement of the city. I am talking about the harbor improvement.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes. We have spent nearly $4,000,000, and the Government has spent less than $3,000,000 on the harbor, so that we have been more than fair.

You say, "Why are you asking for this?" We would not complain if the hurricane had not struck us. Those people are not asking for charity. I will leave it to my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN] and my good friends from Ohio [Messrs. CHALMERS and MORGAN], who went down there and saw the devastation. I leave it to my good friend, Mr. CARTER, of California. They saw conditions shortly after the hurricane, and I want it understood we are not asking for sympathy. We are simply asking you to do that which we believe we are entitled to.

Let me call your attention to this: For the removal of wrecks after the hurricane Miami expended $66,508 in getting the wrecks out of the harbor. The sand was 3 feet deep on some of the streets. Barges, loaded with ballast and rock, were blown into the Royal Palm Park. God knows why the loss of life was not greater. It took hundreds of thousand of dollars for those people to restore streets, and so forth, of the city, and no city ever came back faster than Miami.

I will say, my friends, in conclusion, that I have presented the case as well as I could. If this is setting a precedent, I think it can well be done in view of the terrible disaster which came to Miami. I do not believe I have overdrawn the picture. If any of my colleagues, either on the Republican side or on the Democratic side, who went down there and saw conditions will say that I have overdrawn the picture I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The understanding was, was it not, that this would be paid back in three installments?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. No.

Mr. MADDEN. What was it, then?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. The understanding was that it would be paid back.

Mr. MADDEN. It might not be paid back, then, in 20 years, according to that statement.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That is true; but the understanding also was that this great Government of ours, with a boasted surplus of $600,000,000 during times like those I have pictured to you, would not hold us to 20 years, because Miami would not have advanced the money if that had been understood.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask another question. I have been helping the gentleman to get the money.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That is true, and the hearings show I have thanked the gentleman repeatedly.

Mr. MADDEN. And I will continue to help the gentleman all I can, and I do not think they will have any trouble in getting the money when the time comes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. But will you loan me $40,000 to pay the interest?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman is romancing.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. No; I am not romancing. I am not able to do it myself.

Mr. MADDEN. They did receive $500,000 last year, did they not?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows he is going to get $500,000 more, does he not?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I have that assurance from General Jadwin, and General Jadwin has never yet broken his word.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman has my assurance that I am going down there with him for the purpose of trying to get General Jadwin to allocate this other $605,000. I think the gentleman is trying to legislate this out of the Treasury, and he ought not to be permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has again expired.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Sometimes a man talks too much, but there have been so many speeches on the other side during my time, I want to say this. The city commissioners last December advised me they had to have this money, and on January 17 I received this telegram:

JANUARY 17, 1928.

One million one hundred five thousand harbor notes bearing 5½ per cent interest mature June 1, 1928.

L. J. GRIFFIN,
Director of Finance.

That is the whole question. Those bonds mature in June and we have no money with which to take them up. The city commissioners have asked me to put this up to my colleagues and I have tried to make my case. All I ask of you is to vote as you would have me vote if conditions in your district were just like ours.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I saw in the newspapers a statement to the effect that three banks had failed there the other day and that they were shipping $7,000,000 by airplane to save another one of your banks in Miami; is not that correct?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That is true; but I am not referring to that. That is another condition, due, I am told, to propaganda, while the other was the act of God. [Applause.]

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee whether there is a large sum lying dormant and to the credit of river and harbor activities as a contingent fund?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No. The situation is always this: There are always outstanding contracts, and while the books apparently show an unexpended balance, we will say, of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, almost invariably at least $25,000,000 out of, we will say, $30,000,000 has been obligated for contracts which have been partially performed but which have not been completed and upon which payments are not due. There is really in the hands of the engineers of unexpended balances only a small sum like $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 carried along from time to time to meet extraordinary emergencies which may arise. For instance, we are carrying in this bill $10,000,000 for the Mississippi, but that is not the sum we are going to carry in the flood control bill.

This $10,000,000 is to meet extraordinary emergencies which may arise, and the engineers have been expending down there from this fund the sums which were necessary to meet the pressing and immediate necessities of the situation anywhere all over this country. At any time we may have a disaster like the Galveston flood or like the Mississippi flood.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. This $10,000,000 is the $10,000,000 annual obligation under the act providing for Mississippi River flood control?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And can not be spent anywhere else.

Mr. SPEAKS. Will the gentleman state, as chairman of the committee, that to his knowledge there are no funds to the credit of the river and harbor commission which will not be required during the next fiscal year?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think that is very, very clear, and I intend, if I am able to get the floor, to deal with that very subject. I do not think there is any question about that. They will not have any fund which they can spare beyond the $500,000 they have allocated for the payment of this debt to Miami, and next year, in the 1930 appropriation, they propose to allocate $605,000, the remainder.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I have been assured by General Jadwin that if this bill were increased $10,000,000 Miami could not get another penny more, and I am not asking any city in this country which has a river or harbor to be cut down in order that Miami may benefit by it. In other words, I stand or fall on my proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The amendment reads:

To pay the city of Miami, out of any funds available in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for part reimbursement of the $1,605,000 advanced or loaned to the Government by said city for the improvement of Miami Harbor, as provided under the river and harbor act passed March 3, 1925, in accordance with House Document 516, the sum of $605,000.

I find in the Statutes at Large, Sixty-eighth Congress, page 1187, this statement of the law:

Miami Harbor, Fla.: In accordance with the report submitted in House Document 516, Sixty-seventh Congress, fourth session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document.

The gentleman's amendment refers to the same document and provides that this payment must be made in accordance with House Document 516, which appears to be the law on the subject.

It would seem to the Chair that this furnishes a basis for the appropriation, if Congress wishes to make it, and therefore the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has ruled on the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order because the amendment states that the proposed appropriation is in accordance with a certain document to which it refers, and which by reference of the river and harbor act is made the law controlling the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. But this is changing the law. The document is the law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the appropriation is not in accordance with the document referred to, of course that fact can be shown.

Mr. MADDEN. This is not in accordance with the document.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not see how the Comptroller General could pay it unless it is done in accordance with the document referred to, because the amendment states specifically that it is to be done in accordance with that document.

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment is either a reenactment of the statute or it is nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The river and harbor act provides an authorization as set forth in a certain document.

Mr. MADDEN. This money is paid out of the general river and harbor fund, according to the statements made by the Chief of Engineers of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the Comptroller General would not allow payment of this sum, even though it were carried in this bill, unless it is found to be in accordance with House Document 516, which the river and harbor act makes the law.

Mr. CHALMERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order unless the gentleman from Ohio wishes to be heard.

Mr. CHALMERS. I simply wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair is absolutely correct in the ruling, and if necessary I would be pleased to give my reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS of Florida: On page 78, after line 16, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Harbor improvements: To pay the city of Miami, out of any funds available in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for part reimbursement of the $1,605,000 advanced or loaned to the Government by said city for the improvement of Miami Harbor as provided under the river and harbor act passed March 3, 1925, in accordance with House Document No. 516, the sum of $605,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the commitee divided, and there were—ayes 101, noes 87.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. SEARS of Florida.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 142, noes 115.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation; for survey of northern and northwestern lakes, Lake of the Woods, and other boundary and connecting waters between the said lake and Lake Superior, Lake Champlain, and the natural navigable waters embraced in the navigation system of the New York canals, including all necessary expenses for preparing, correcting, extending, printing, binding, and issuing charts and bulletins and of investigating lake levels with a view to their regulation; for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors, provided that no funds shall be expended for any preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate not authorized by law; and for the prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City, for pay of inspectors, deputy inspectors, crews, and office force, and for maintenance of patrol fleet and expenses of office, $50,000,000.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and do so for the purpose of making a statement pertinent to this section and asking a question as to the construction of it.

In the early days of last November a great disaster overtook the State of Vermont in the form of a flood. People have not yet come to fully realize its full extent or far-reaching effect. In 24 hours a damage was caused equal in amount to one-tenth of the assessed valuation of all the taxable property in the State. Our highway and bridge damage was $7,377,469, according to a survey by the Bureau of Public Roads. Our total damage was $30,435,000, according to the latest information. The highway and bridge damage means a per capita loss of $21 for every man, woman, and child in the State; our total damage a per capita loss of $86. I venture the assertion that this was one of the greatest disasters that ever overtook the people of any State in the history of the Nation.

Going back we find that other disastrous floods occurred in 1869, 1850, 1830, 1811, and 1785. These floods affected practically the same valleys and the same areas. No survey to determine if there is any practicable way of controlling floods or lessening the damages therefrom has ever been made for Vermont.

I have filed with the Committee on Flood Control petitions signed by hundreds of Vermont citizens asking the Federal Government to take some action for their protection.

Now, I wish to know from the chairman if sufficient funds are available from this appropriation to make this survey possible by the engineers of the War Department.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is the judgment of the subcommittee, I will state to the gentleman from Vermont, that this paragraph does carry enough money; in fact, the Chief of Engineers testified before the committee that out of this $50,000,000 he proposes to allocate $1,500,000 for surveys with respect of flood control, power possibilities, navigation, and purposes of that kind.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it the opinion of the chairman of the subcommittee that this will be sufficient to take care of all the work?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; because this appropriation is a lump-sum appropriation. It is allocated to different projects. It is sometimes found that one project can use more money than has been allotted to it, while another project does not need so much. So there is enough money here, in the opinion of the committee, and if the Chief of Engineers needs any more money for these surveys, in addition to the $1,500,000 which he proposes to allocate, the committee is of the opinion he can find it.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 79, line 10, strike out the figures "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$55,886,310."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this deals with appropriations for river and harbor work throughout the entire country. It is quite an important item, and I suggest to the chairman of the subcommittee that we agree upon a limit of reasonable time in which to discuss it.

Mr. BARBOUR. What does the gentleman say to a half hour on each side?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would like to have 20 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, say 40 minutes on a side.

Mr. NEWTON. Reserving the right to object, in the division of time is it to be from this side of the aisle and that side of the aisle, or for and against the amendment?

Mr. BARBOUR. For and against the amendment is my understanding, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half by myself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question, and I hope the chairman of the subcommittee will agree to an hour on a side. We are not under great pressure for time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have had several requests for time on this side.

Mr. BARBOUR. Let us make it 45 minutes on a side.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to an hour and a half, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that there can be no control of time by agreement in Committee of the Whole. An agreement may be entered into for the limitation of debate. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time for debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to an hour and a half. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I suggest that the speeches of five minutes each be alternated for and against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in the control of the Chair, and doubtless the Chair will follow that suggestion.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it better be understood in the agreement.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We do not want any such agreement as that, to limit the remarks to five minutes. It is difficult to speak upon a matter of this importance in five minutes with any satisfaction.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not mean that every speech would be limited to five minutes, but that the speeches should be alternated for and against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to one hour and a half. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the pending amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I vote to sustain the action of the committee, but I am impelled not to do so in this particular instance. I favor the adoption of the pending amendment. No money is used by our Government which means more to our commercial life than that appropriated for the improvement of our inland waterways and harbors. Water transportation is much cheaper than land transportation; high freight rates are impeding our industrial development. I understand that the Army engineers say that approximately $56,000,000 can be used in the development of these waterways and at the same time conserve the rules of economy. West Virginia will not get any improvement out of this appropriation. I am especially interested in the improvement of the Great Kanawha River. The Government built 10 dams in this river between 1880 and 1898 to improve navigation. A portion of these dams are now entirely obsolete, and the remainder are inadequate for the present requirements of that great industrial valley. There are approximately 18,000,000,000 tons of unmined coal lying within the bowels of the earth in this valley; much of this coal is the finest quality in the world. Our chemical industry at and near Charleston is developing so rapidly that it will soon be the greatest chemical center of the Nation. We have the largest ax factory as well as the largest glass plant in the world; we also have numerous other factories of various kinds. Nature has made this section one of the most desirable for factory purposes in the United States.

I assume that all the river and harbor improvements authorized by Congress are meritorious, but I venture the assertion that but few, if any, have more merit than the Great Kanawha River from the standpoint of available tonnage shipments.

It is my purpose to introduce a bill within the next few days in this body authorizing the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, after which I shall have more to say relative to the improvement of same. It is my purpose to fully inform Congress of the inexhaustible resources of this valley and of the immense tonnage that will be transported therefrom as soon as the Government equips the river with proper transportation facilities. The Ohio and Mississippi Rivers need the tonnage from this valley, and if this improvement is made the Kanawha Valley will be able to supply the southern consumers with cheaper coal and also establish a large foreign market from Panama. We will also be able to furnish the West and great Northwest with the finest quality of coal in the world at a much lower rate than they are now paying.

Every Member of this House ought to be, and perhaps is, in favor of a great inland waterway system. These improvements should be completed at the earliest possible date, and I earnestly plead with my colleagues to manifest their interest therein by voting for the adoption of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would recognize some Member opposed to the amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. This is with the consent of the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, my own present situation is such, owing to the fact that I have been endeavoring to negotiate a compromise of the subject matter of this amendment, that I feel constrained to follow the Committee on the Rivers and Harbors appropriation item. I do think, however, that there are certain vital matters which are not thoroughly appreciated either by the committee or by the House, and to which I shall direct attention.

We have in the United States adopted projects, live projects, to complete which will call for an expenditure of $250,000,000. We have all agreed, as I understand it, the engineers, the Committee on Appropriations, the House, and the public that works of this nature should be prosecuted with such reasonable celerity as the circumstances will permit. We have the funds and the time has come when we are not faced with a war situation. We have reduced taxes four times. We have reduced the expenses of the Government. The President in a recent message said that we are now at a point where we may undertake great internal improvements, and certainly there are no improvements so important as the development of navigation in this country through improving our harbors and inland streams. We have reached an agreement, unwritten, and which is perhaps no more than a general understanding, that works of this nature should be completed in five years. We have found from experience that if funds are provided this can be done.

We have $250,000,000 to-day of uncompleted, important improvements of this nature. If we are to complete these projects within five years we must have more than $50,000,000 a year. I am not speaking in regard to this particular appropriation, but I am speaking as to the duty of this country toward river and harbor appropriations in the immediate future, and I want to show what the situation is.

How much were we able to use last year on the new work out of a $50,000,000 appropriation? We expended $17,000,000 for maintenance and that left only $33,000,000 for new work. We need, therefore, without taking into account new projects, which are sure to be adopted, if we are to carry out our five-year program, as we all agree we should do, $50,000,000 a year for new work and $17,000,000 a year for maintenance, $67,000,000 a year in all. We have adopted a provision for a survey of practically all of the navigable streams in the United States, for navigation, for power, for irrigation, for municipal uses, for every possible use to which water can be put. It is probably the most important legislation which Congress has adopted in many years. Formerly we made separate appropriations for them, in addition to the lump sum. This, which will amount to $1,500,000, is included this year in the $50,000,000, as is also the ordinary surveys, which will cost $250,000, making altogether $1,750,000 to come out of this $50,000,000 before we can apply it to maintenance and new work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. In a moment. Maintenance last year cost $17,000,000. You can easily figure that with an appropriation of $50,000,000 we are not going to be able to complete our five-year program; but when you come to consider the matter, you find that it is not a five-year program for $250,000,000. Why do I say that? Because in a great country like this, growing in business, developing and multiplying in transportation, increasing in wealth, increasing just as rapidly in commerce, you are bound to make your waterway improvements keep pace with the times. We must develop our waterways just as we develop the railroads and keep pace with the railroads. To illustrate that, on the Great Lakes the average size of a lake freighter in 1900 was 3,500 tons and to-day it is 14,000 tons, and without that growth we could not have maintained the low cost of transportation on the Great Lakes, the lowest cost of transportation the world has ever known, 1 mill per ton per mile, upon which is based all of the steel and iron development of this great country of ours. We find that in order to keep the Great Lakes in line with transportation developments as they are progressing, we must increase the depth of the channels. To be sure, to-day, through the fact that we have had an excessive rainfall and that we are in a deep-water cycle, the Great Lakes have come back to pretty nearly the statutory depth of 20 to 21 feet, but for a long period of years we had only about 18 feet, and we must provide not alone for the high-water times but for the low-water times, and in order to do that we must deepen the channels of the Great Lakes. There is coming in here within the next two weeks a report in favor of deepening the Great Lakes at a cost undoubtedly of several million dollars, and that adds to your $250,000,000.

As I stepped into the Hall this morning I ran across a Representative from the State of New Jersey who is a friend of the Representative from Camden. They are to have a report made in their favor which shows that the city of Camden itself is to spend $2,000,000 on terminals and docks, and modern loading and unloading devices, to make that a great and modern and useful port. The locality has shown its belief in the project by bonding itself for $2,000,000. Undoubtedly the expenditure on the part of the United States will be many millions of dollars, and how are we to provide for it? We should not delay work on the projects already adopted. These two cases—the Great Lakes and the Camden case—are simply illustrative of numerous cases all over the United States. This country does not stand still. This country is moving forward at an astounding pace, and as it goes forward we find that in places where you thought you had no particular need for transportation suddenly there arises a great tonnage, and that tonnage demands transportation.

Take in further illustration the city of Los Angeles. A harbor was improved there which many people thought would be of little value. It had after a time a tonnage of 2,000,000 tons a year, and then there was discovered there great quantities of oil, and in one year the tonnage jumped from 2,000,000 tons per year up to 2,000,000 tons per month. And what happened in Los Angeles is happening all over the Texas coast, where they have a most tremendous oil and a very great fruit development. To provide for the growing needs of this great country in waterway transportation and to carry out a five-year program we must have much more money than we have had in the past.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. This so-called five-year program was adopted some two or three years ago, was it not?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Now, since that was done, Congress has authorized a great many additional projects for the improvement of rivers and harbors, projects as have been approved. How much do those projects involve?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The last bill, I think, carried something like $60,000,000 or $70,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. If that is true, there will have to be some appropriations made to begin those projects?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Not only those projects, but other projects which will be adopted from time to time. Here we have, first, the public demanding water transportation. Go to any port, any great vicinity where they have developed a large commerce, and you will find a whole city a seething mass demanding river and harbor development. Out in the Middle West you find the farmer is suffering from a long period of hard times. He says transportation is one of his largest costs, and he knows, by studying the figures, that he can get cheaper transportation by water than otherwise. Mr. Babson says in one of his letters that we have become the greatest mass-producing manufacturing Nation of all the nations of the world, and we have solved that problem of mass production; but he says we have utterly failed and gone back on the problem of distribution, so that to-day a product the manufacturing cost of which is 20 cents costs the consumer a dollar. And he said that in the next few years he confidently believes that the problem of distribution will be solved just as successfully as we have solved that of mass production. The prime problem confronting us will be that of distribution, and that will eventually be cut down to reasonable proportions. Part of what is saved in the distribution of agricultural products will go to the farmer and increase his profits.

The farmer believes that improving of the channels in our rivers will give him cheaper transportation, that what he saves will be largely, if not wholly, his, and that these river improvements will be a large measure of farm relief. The farmer regards the making of our rivers navigable as something that is practical, something that is at hand, and something that can be done for him now.

Let us take the other aspect of the matter. Here are the farmers of the Middle West, those who, for instance, can ship by the Missouri when its channel is deepened and its banks stabilized, saying that cheap transportation will afford them relief. Let us see what the attitude of Congress is toward that question. I happened just yesterday to have a talk with the chairman of the committee that deals with that question in the other body, and he said to me, "Are you going to have a rivers and harbors bill?" I said, "Here is the Great Lakes problem on which the iron and steel business of the country depends. It is a question in which every American is interested, and if the report on deepening the Great Lakes channels comes to us we feel that we must have a bill." He said, "What good is there of a bill? You are not going to make appropriations to complete within a reasonable time even the projects already adopted. How are you going to add new projects to the ever growing list and get the money necessary to finish the five-year program?" That is the feeling of all those in Congress who are interested in waterway transportation. How much time have I used, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 14 minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. DEMPSEY Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the gentleman think the Congress should appropriate immediately money sufficient, even if it takes a hundred million dollars, in the interest of economy to complete the major projects that are of primary importance?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; I will answer that question. So far as this bill is concerned, I feel three things: First, that I was a party to the negotiation of a compromise which makes me a supporter of the present bill as it is; second, I do not think we have given the country full and fair notice of this five-year program or what it means; and third, I recognize also that there are unusual and very large demands on the Treasury at this session of Congress. And so all of those things unite in tying my hands. Yet I believe that we should adopt a program of appropriating each year one-fifth of the total amount of money necessary to complete every live project, and also each year, whatever sum it is necessary to expend for maintenance. Appropriations for surveys, both the annual surveys and these unusual surveys of the rivers of the country, for which we recently provided and which cost millions of dollars, should be made in addition to those necessary for other new work and for maintenance.

Mr. McDUFFIE. After having adopted the amendment a moment ago taking care of Miami, it means that $605,000 more shall come out of this bill, and that means that we shall have in a year $605,000 less for the construction of rivers and harbors. That is true, is it not?

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is true if the amendment means anything. I think the amendment as adopted does not mean anything. I think it means they are to be paid according to the law as it is, and the law as it is is that they are to be paid as the Government wants to pay them. But I do think there is no work so important to the people of this country—I do not think the work even of providing for the Army or the Navy is of greater importance—than to provide the cheap transportation by water for all our products, whatever they may be.

I believe that the iron and steel business would never have come into existence, that we would not have supplied even our own domestic needs, much less would we have been exporting, except for cheap transportation on the Great Lakes. Let me add also that cheap transportation on rivers is illustrated by the Monongahela River, where they carry coal at about 15 cents a ton as against a railroad rate of about $1.12 a ton.

Now, there is another reason besides the fact that transportation is cheaper why we should provide transportation by rivers.. This country is rapidly growing. We have transportation facilities for our people to-day. We will have 40,000,000 more people in 25 years, but we have no transportation facilities for them. The easiest, the cheapest, and best way to provide that transportation is by water. It is the only way, because new railroads are not being built. We have no additional mileage. We have practically the same railroads to-day we had 10 years ago. We have not added any considerable mileage in that time and we do not bid fair to add additional mileage. Unless we provide these transportation facilities by water we will lack, as Mr. Loree, president of the Delaware & Hudson Railroad Co., recently said, the transportation with which to supply our people with the necessaries of life—with food to sustain life and with coal to keep them warm.

This is the situation in a general way. We might as well face the fact that if we are to continue waterway development we must have a program of appropriations sufficient to meet the needs of the country, and those needs, as generally recognized and sensed, mean a 5-year program; the completion of every project not in 20 years, as the Ohio is about to be completed, but in 5 years, because that is economical, because it gives you in a reasonable time the use of the many millions which you have expended on a project and you never have any substantial r turn in being able to navigate a stream until the improvement is complete, because it provides the transportation which is promised when we adopt the project, and because a five-year program insures the performance of the work on every project in a businesslike and sensible as well as an economical way. Delays on these projects are always costly. They mean that the people do not get what Congress promises each time it adopts a project. By indefinite delays we lose in great part the benefit of the legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I take it from what the gentleman says—and I have been listening very attentively in order to get a word of cheer somewhere—that the Rivers and Harbors Committee has a plan under which it does not propose to establish any new projects until the end of this five-year period, during which we will appropriate sufficient money to complete the projects which the committee has already worked out—is that right?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No. What we have in mind is that we believe we have a great chairman of the Committee on Appropriations who has broad vision, splendid judgment, and who can see the needs and necessities of the country and that he will provide for new projects of merit in just the same broad-minded and splendid way that he has in the past in helping to provide for existing projects. [Applause.]

I have referred to the fact that the cheap transportation of the Great Lakes was the basis of the development of the iron and steel business of this country, and has served as a most economical method to distribute the coal of Pennsylvania through the Northwest. The cheap transportation of these lakes, too, has been the means of building up the numerous great cities which border on them, commencing with Duluth, taking in Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, and ending with Buffalo. The crying need of to-day is for a deep-waterway connection between the Great Lakes and the ocean. Such a waterway will pay a splendid profit on the cost of construction, whatever it may be. Circumstances may, however, delay the adoption of this project for some time. Deep-water navigation is being extended through Canada to Lake Ontario by the construction of the Welland Canal, which is nearing completion. This canal is 25 miles in length, and its construction involves an expenditure of about $125,000,000. The question arises whether the United States should be content to use this Canadian connection between the two lakes, or whether, on the other hand, the United States should have a canal of its own and within its own territory.

Every citizen of the United States agrees that if the commerce between Lakes Erie and Ontario is to be large and important—if it is to be large in volume and great in value—it would be better to have a canal of our own, rather than to depend on one wholly within a foreign country, which belongs to it alone, and over the operation of which it will have sole and exclusive jurisdiction. While we may not expect a traffic on Lake Ontario comparable to that on the other Great Lakes, the greatest commerce in the world, it is but natural to expect that enough commerce will go in both directions to make the volume large for any inland water other than the Great Lakes. It is to be remembered that Buffalo has now an annual water-borne commerce of 20,000,000 tons, yet the great iron and steel business there is only in its infancy, the many huge plants there having been started a comparatively few years ago. So far Buffalo and the Niagara frontier have been, so far as water transportation is concerned, in a similar position to a vicinity which has a standard-gauge railroad running in one direction and a narrow-gauge road only in the other direction. In other words, the Niagara frontier has had the enormous benefit of the Great Lakes system to the west, but has had leading east only the Erie Canal, which is too shallow and accommodates boats of such small tonnage as not to be able to compete successfully with the large units of modern transportation.

With deep water transportation to the east, a large tonnage coming and going on Lake Ontario is, it is firmly believed, assured. It is quite certain, however, that the tonnage on a canal running through the Niagara frontier, which already has 20,000,000 tons of water-borne commerce annually, would be much larger than by the Welland Canal, which runs through an open country, from which practically no tonnage would come.

So we come naturally to the point that as a large commerce can be expected through a deeper waterway connecting the two lakes and on Lake Ontario, it would be better for this country to own and control the operation of a canal of its own rather than to use the foreign Welland Canal, provided a canal of our own can be constructed at a reasonable cost, as compared with that of the Welland, and which will afford facilities at least equal to those of the Welland Canal.

The great objection to all canals is that, owing to the fact that vessels passing through them at a high rate of speed wash away and destroy the banks, ships must be slowed down to about one-third of their speed on the Great Lakes. This prolongs the journey and adds to the cost of transportation. While the Welland Canal is, as has been said, 25 miles long, and owing to the geography of the locality, had to be constructed in a straight line north and south, the situation on the American side is such that it provides two natural and highly desirable routes, one from La Salle to Lewiston, both on the Niagara River, and the other from Tonawanda, also on the Niagara River, via Lockport, to Olcott. The La Salle-Lewiston route is only 11 miles long; that from Tonawanda to Olcott is 24 miles long.

A survey was made in 1900 of these two routes which is so comprehensive and able as to rank as highly as any waterway report made in the history of the country. It shows that at that time a 21-foot channel by the La Salle-Lewiston route would have cost $43,214,344, while the cost of such a canal by the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott route would have been $49,274,894. The president of one of our greatest railroads, who has had a great experience in construction work and knows its cost well, says that such costs as those involved here have not increased on the whole since 1900; while the cost of labor has increased largely, the expense of the work to be done by machinery has decreased greatly, owing to the greater efficiency of the machinery of to-day, so that the increase in the one case is just about offset by the decrease in the other.

The conclusion, therefore, is natural, if not inevitable, not alone that there will be a large volume of commerce through a deep waterway connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario, and on Lake Ontario, but that a canal shorter in distance and in the time necessary to navigate it can be constructed on the United States than on the Canadian side, and it is obvious that it would be to the advantage of the United States to have this commerce rather than to have it go to a foreign country. It will be a decided advantage, also, to our country to own, control, and operate its own waterway rather than to depend upon a foreign waterway. It will be a decided and great benefit, too, to have this waterway pass through the thickly settled American Niagara frontier, where there are nearly a million people, and which already has a waterway-transportation business of 20,000,000 tons a year rather than for the American frontier to be obliged to send to and receive from the Welland Canal, for a distance of 25 miles, all of its Lake Ontario water-borne commerce, both passenger and freight.

Next, the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott Canal is shorter than the Welland, and a canal by the La Salle-Lewiston route would be less than half the length of the Welland. A canal by either American route will cost only a fraction of the expense of the construction of the Welland Canal. An American canal by either route would be quicker to navigate than the Welland, because by the La Salle-Lewiston route we would have less than half the canal navigation which would be encountered on the Welland, and by the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott route, owing to the fact that the canal from Lockport to the lake passes through a deep gulf, with natural, high banks, which would not wash, the time occupied in navigating the canal would be considerably shorter than by the Welland Canal.

The American Niagara frontier is the largest center for any canal connecting the two lakes—Erie and Ontario. It has the second largest tonnage of any place on the Great Lakes and is the largest center of population between Lake Erie and New York City. It is growing with prodigious strides, and when once such an increased diversion of water for power purposes is permitted to be made from the Niagara River as can be safely granted without impairment to the scenic grandeur, judging by the growth of the city of Niagara Falls since the present diversion was made, the increase in population, wealth, and transportation by water will be rapid and enormous. For all freight originating in the Niagara frontier and to go east, or coming from the east with the Niagara frontier as its destination, the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott route is the best of the three routes and incomparably better than the Canadian route by the Welland.

To-day the Niagara frontier has, as has been said, water transportation east only by the Erie Canal, which is too shallow to make it economical or practical.

Transportation by the Welland Canal to or from the east for the entire Niagara frontier would be both uneconomical and impractical because of the added distances shown by the preceding tables.

As the frontier already has deep-water transportation to and from the west, and the Welland Canal is neither practical nor economical for transportation to the east, it is hard to see how it is of advantage to or adds to the facilities of any part of the Niagara frontier.

On the other hand, with the Niagara River deepened to the same depth as the Great Lakes channels from Tonawanda to Niagara Falls, the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott route would not alone furnish the shortest and most economical transportation for the frontier to and from the east, but it would also be of very great value for water transportation between the different points in the frontier.

It is to be remembered, too, that the Niagara frontier, with all of the facilities which come with a million of population, would afford the many advantages needed by ships, such as supplies, dry docks for repairs, and, whenever advantageous, the taking on or discharging of part of a cargo, none of which advantages would be afforded on the route of the Canadian waterway.

Then, too, Buffalo, with its great harbor, would afford safety and protection to vessels in case of storm, with no such protection afforded the Erie entrance of the Canadian Canal.

Even for through traffic the Tonawanda-Lockport-Olcott route is shorter than that by the Welland Canal in distance and would be much shorter in time because, as has been said, of the fact that for much of the distance from Lockport to Olcott that route is between high banks, which will not wash, and a boat would not be required to slow down.

Because, therefore, it is better to own a canal of our own, better to control and operate it than to depend upon a foreign canal; because we have two routes on the American side, both of which are highly preferable for all traffic, and especially so to all freight originating in or the destination of which is the Niagara frontier, for navigation purposes to the Canadian route; because both of the American routes pass through a great center of population, where a great volume of freight originates and is received; because a canal by either American route will cost much less than the Canadian canal will cost; and because the operation of an American route will build up American commerce and help make certain that we continue to hold, as we do to-day, the great volume of transportation on the Great Lakes; and because the routes on our side are American routes and not foreign routes I earnestly advocate the speedy adoption of the project for the construction of an American canal connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario by a channel of the same depth as the channels in the Great Lakes.

It is to be borne in mind that the question is a practical and financial one. The International Joint Commission, representing this country and Canada, in 1921 agreed upon a report which was submitted to the Senate, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, Document No. 114, pages 178 and 179, in which it was recommended that—each country should be debited with its share of the entire cost of all works necessary for navigation, including the cost of the Welland Canal, based upon * * * cargo tonnage * * *.

The report said also—

* * * the fair and reasonable plan appears to be to divide the cost in proportion to the benefits each receives.

Our commerce on the Great Lakes amounts to over 100,000,000 tons annually and that of Canada to about 7,000,000 tons, so if the division is to be made in proportion to tonnage we would pay over $100,000,000 of the cost of the Welland Canal, and yet have no interest in it and no control over its operation. We can construct a canal of our own, a very much better canal, which we will own and control, which will serve our commerce infinitely better, at a fraction of what Canada would deem, if we use it, we should pay toward the cost of the Welland Canal. And we, a rich, prosperous people, want no friction with a smaller, poorer, and friendly neighbor over a question of this kind; we would want to pay what Canada deems fair or not use her canal.

There is another improvement for which there is a crying need on the Niagara River. We have throughout our century and a half of existence been allowing many of our water powers to run to waste and have been drawing, needlessly and extravagantly, to the extent that water power would take its place, upon our limited supplies of coal. The greatest of all our water powers is that at Niagara Falls. Two hundred and twenty-six thousand cubic feet per second of water flow down the Niagara River. By treaty with Canada 56,000 cubic feet is diverted for power purposes—36,000 on the Canadian side and 20,000 in our country. Niagara Falls is divided into two parts, the American Falls, of 1,000 feet in width, and the Horseshoe Falls, 3,000 feet wide, with Goat Island between the two falls. Ten thousand cubic feet per second flow over the 1,000 feet on the American side, and makes a most beautiful spectacle, presenting a deep stream, with no rocks anywhere visible. The remaining 160,000 cubic feet flow over the Horseshoe Falls, most of it in a few hundred feet in the center of the fall, where it has eroded and worn back the face of the fall for hundreds of feet, while the greater part of the 3,000 feet is bare rocks, with practically no water flowing over it.

A miniature of Niagara Falls has been constructed adjacent to the bank on the American side of the river and is in operation, by which to demonstrate that by placing cement blocks in the bed of the Canadian side of the stream the flow of the water can be spread so that it will cover evenly the entire Canadian or Horseshoe Falls, just as the face of the American Falls is covered to-day. On the basis of 10,000 feet making a beautiful fall over a width of 1,000 feet, the Horseshoe Falls, after the spread in the flow of the river has been accomplished, should require but 30,000 feet to make as beautiful and satisfying a spectacle as the American Falls presents. This would result in its being safe to divert 130,000 cubic feet more for power purposes. I do not suggest that there be an immediate additional diversion of this amount of water, however. A diversion of 80,000 cubic feet, only two-thirds of what it would seem perfectly safe to divert, without impairing or imperiling the beauty or grandeur of the Falls, would be highly conservative and could not by any possibility do harm.

The question of permitting any additional diversion could be left to commissioners representing the two countries, who would proceed only as they found, on actual experience, it safe and wise for them to do so. Of course, the permit to divert additional water should be coupled with a condition that the licensees should construct the works in the Canadian River spreading the flow of the water over the Horseshoe Falls.

As a result of such an added diversion, and of simultaneously constructing works in the bed of the river to spread its flow, we would stop the erosion of the Horseshoe Falls and would have there a continuous fall, 3,000 feet in width, with no bare or unsightly rocks visible, but with only a beautiful waterfall for that entire broad width. Man will have improved upon nature, and this one of the seven wonders of the world will be a grander sight than it has ever before been. And at the same time, a diversion of 80,000 additional cubic feet per second will produce 2,400,000 additional horsepower, the equivalent of the enormous volume of 24,000,000 tons of coal annually. While this additional power will add enormously to the prosperity of the Niagara frontier, the question is by no means a local one. Through the power already developed, Niagara Falls has become the electrochemical center of the world, and the power has been carried besides to municipalities 200 miles away. The position of Niagara Falls as an electrochemical center enables it to manufacture many products of the greatest value to us in times of peace and in the World War this power produced over 80 per cent of many of the ingredients going into the manufacture of our munitions of war. All this has been accomplished through a diversion of only 20,000 cubic feet for power purposes on the American side. What stupendous results will be accomplished when we add 40,000 cubic feet more and put it at work for the benefit of the Nation. It is hard to conceive the enormous benefits which are certain to come to all of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] may proceed for 20 minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand, the gentleman is in favor of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He is in favor of the amendment. The gentleman is the proponent of the amendment. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I hope I may have the attention of the distinguished chairman [Mr. MADDEN] and that he will be convinced of the absolute necessity for the adoption of this amendment. I was not surprised but somewhat gratified to hear the speech made by my friend Mr. DEMPSEY, the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who said that while he was going along with the committee and support the $50,000,000 Budget figures, because of a certain situation in which he finds himself he is not in a position now that justifies him in going with many of those, even on his own side as well as on our side of the aisle, who believe that this amendment should be adopted.

His speech and attitude on this amendment reminds me of a little story I heard—if you will permit me to tell it—about a colored minister down home in the far Southland who was taking the devil for his text in a series of meetings. He talked about the devil day in and day out. He described the devil as having red skin, a long forked tail, forked hands and forked ears, breathing smoke from his nostrils, and with fire in his eyes. He could not say enough bad things about the devil. At the end of the seventh day, and late in the evening as the minister was as usual accusing the devil, a youngster in the community, dressed to look like the devil as he had been described, crawled in the window of the church. He had an electric apparatus which permitted him to have his eyes shine like fire, and as he smoked a cigarette the smoke was blown out of his mouth and nostrils. The congregation, of course, began to get to the door so as to pass out as quickly as possible. The devil got between the door and the preacher. The preacher being shut off from escape looked at him and said, "Mr. Devil, I want to say something to you." He said, "It is true I have said all manner of evil things against you. I have charged that all of these troubles and shootings in this community are traceable directly to you. I have said hard things about you, it is true, but I just want to say to you right now that my heart has been with you all the time." [Laughter.]

That, gentlemen, is the attitude of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee [Mr. DEMPSEY]. He is voting with the committee against the amendment and praying to God the amendment will be adopted. [Laughter and applause.] There may be others on your side in the same fix. I hope there are not many.

There is no pleasure, certainly none for me, and none on the Democratic side, in this or any other effort to disturb the President's Budget figures. The Budget is not a sacred thing, however, and Members of Congress owe something to their constituencies and the country as well as to the Budget. While the country may believe that but for the President's "sitting on the lid," the Congress would have long ago pulled all the money out of the Treasury and wasted it, the record shows—and I call the chairman [Mr. MADDEN] as a witness—that the Congress, under the leadership of himself and others, with the cooperation of the Democratic side as well, has appropriated since the installation of the Budget system $250,000,000 less than the President's Budget estimates.

Mr. MADDEN. It is more than $350,000,000 less.

Mr. McDUFFIE. So much the better. Then, why be afraid the Congress is going to run away with the Public Treasury and waste the country's financial resources?

Mr. MADDEN. We gave that back to the taxpayers, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; and in appropriating for this great work you are going to give the taxpayers more money and more advantages, according to the words of the President himself, who many times has approved appropriations for rivers and harbors, and even in his last message he said, "Improvements of this kind are compatible with economy." Again he said, "Such expenditures are creative of wealth; they add to taxable values and tend to lower the tax burdens." These are the words of the President of the United States, whose Budget officers cut the estimate of the engineers $5,886,310 without assigning any reason whatsoever.

The amendment I have just offered, gentlemen, which I hope you will adopt, simply raises the Budget figures from $50,000,000 to $55,886,310, the amount the engineers estimate is needed for the next year. Why should this be done?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] just called to your attention the fact that since we adopted, or, rather, since some sort of suggestion was made that we should appropriate $50,000,000 a year for five years to complete a program; since we began that program we have added $73,000,000 in authorizations to be carried out and appropriated for by the Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. I wonder if the gentleman would answer the question which my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], failed to answer—whether in carrying out this five-year program you are going to add $72,000,000 to the program.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not know how many more projects are going to be added to the program. The Illinois River in the gentleman's State will need a little more attention. The survey provided for in this bill will determine that and fix our future policy in using all our inland waterways.

Mr. MADDEN. The Illinois River is only $3,000,000.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And I want to help the gentleman and will help him get that project completed at the earliest date. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to stop appropriating for projects that are absolutely necessary in the proper and orderly functioning of our transportation systems?

Mr. MADDEN. No: but I want the committee, including the leading Democrat on the committee and the leading Republican on the committee, who is the chairman——

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thank you, but I am not the leading Democrat on the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the gentleman is easily the leading man wherever he happens to be. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman is very clever, but he is now "damning me with faint praise." [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not worth being damned for?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Well, to say the least, I would rather have the gentleman's compliment in the cloakroom or elsewhere than at this particular time and place.

Mr. MADDEN. More people will know about it here.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Oh, well, the others here may have the same keen intelligence and perception the gentleman possesses and may have already found it out themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad to know the gentleman acknowledges it. [Laughter and applause]. Seriously, if we are sincerely for the five-year program and want to complete it, of course we can not complete it if we double it in that time. That is fair, is it not?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is fair; but we are not going to double it. There is no intention of doubling it. We must continue to adopt worthy projects.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What the gentleman means is that you can not complete the program if you add to it unless you simultaneously also add to the appropriation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Why, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not what I meant. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. May I ask the gentleman a question here which I think will clarify the situation?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. If this amendment carries we are then going on a basis of $55,000,000. We have a nine-year program ahead of us instead of a five-year program.

Mr. McDUFFIE. At the rate of $50,000,000 a year; yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. If we keep on a $55,000,000 basis or probably raise it to $60,000,000, we can catch up, and then when certain projects are completed that money will go on the new projects that will come in.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me make just one statement here? While you are doing that, of course, you will have hundreds of millions of dollars to be appropriated for flood control. Do not forget that.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Let me say to the gentleman that the people of this Nation are committed to the proposition of controlling the flood hazards of the Mississippi River regardless of what we do in a bill of this kind or regardless of what happens to this amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Not yet, but they ought to be.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; and the Congress will endeavor to formulate—and I hope we can fix at this session—a definite, permanent, and adequate policy for Mississippi River flood control, and appropriate ample funds to begin the work at an early date.

Mr. MADDEN. I think they will, and I will help them.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Let me give the Members here a concrete example, from the hearings, as to what is going to happen in the expenditure of public funds for this work, if we expend $55,000,000, and, on the other hand, if we expend $50,000,000 during the next year. I want to call your attention to some of the new projects and show you how they are affected. These are the last projects adopted in the last river and harbor bill:

The Thames, Conn., under the $55,000,000 scheme, gets $300,000, while under the $50,000,000 it gets $250,000, a difference of $50,000.

Passaic (N. J.) and Hackensack Harbors get $300,000 under the $55,000,000 appropriation and $250,000 under the $50,000,000.

Appomattox, Va., would be cut down $11,000.

Channel to Newport News, in which the Navy is interested, cut down $82,500.

Beaufort-Cape Fear River Channel would be cut down $150,000.

Charleston Harbor, another place that the Navy is interested in, $15,000.

Savannah Harbor, $30,000.

Jacksonville to Miami, $50,000.

Sabine-Neches waterway, Tex., $220,500.

Galveston Channel, $71,000.

Moline, Ill., and Hastings Lock and Dam, Minn., instead of spending $1,500,000, as would be done under a $55,000,000 appropriation, under the $50,000,000 carried in this bill, they would spend $1,300,000, a cut of $200,000.

On the Missouri River from Kansas City to Sioux City it is hoped they can spend $600,000, whereas under the $50,000,000 program as now carried in the bill, they can only spend $450,000—a difference of $150,000.

The Illinois River, under the $55,000,000 program, they would spend $525,000, while under the $50,000,000 program they would spend $475,000.

At Michigan City there is only a change of $5,000.

At Sandusky Harbor, Ohio, under the $55,000,000 program they would spend $605,000, whereas under the $50,000,000 program only $500,000—a difference and reduction of $105,000.

In the State of California, for projects there, very worthy ones, too, $150,000 less can be expended under the terms of the bill as presented us than will be expended if my amendment is adopted. Let us remember that the usual amount for preliminary surveys—$250,000, which we always provide in addition to the $50,000,000—must, under this bill, come out of the $50,000,000. With $1,500,000 for general surveys, we have a total of $1,750,000 to be expended outside of the regular construction and maintenance work. This leaves less than $50,000,000 for the work next year.

It is elemental that the less money you give the engineers the less progress they are going to make. This money will not be wasted and there is no "pork" in this appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Is it not true that we only have $30,000,000 or $32,000,000 to expend on projects under the present plan?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think that is true, and I thank the gentleman. The testimony before the committee shows that it is absolutely necessary to have $2,000,000 to begin what I think is the most constructive step forward taken by the Congress in years in reference to the utilization of waterways. This bill carries the initial appropriation for that work.

The last Congress provided a general study of all the streams of the country with a view of getting their maximum development from the standpoint of power, flood control, and navigation, treating each stream as a unit. Every State in the Union is affected by this survey, and the survey is for the progress in every State in proportion to the amount of money furnished by Congress to expedite this important work.

Many projects have been found useless—probably a hundred of them—on which the engineers are no longer spending much money. Some have been abandoned entirely. This study will disclose their uselessness, wherever they may be, and Congress can act more intelligently in striking these projects from the calendar, and thereby save that much money, which will go into the general fund for more meritorious and for the major projects of the country.

Here is a map recently made by the engineers and the Power Commission showing the country divided into zones. In each zone where you see a red figure, immediately on the passage of this bill the engineers will put their experts there to study every stream with a view of developing its maximum utilization for the purposes I have just mentioned; that is, for navigation, power, and flood control.

We are just entering the power age, the age of electricity, as we did the steam age. Electricity is being multiplied in its uses. It is doing away with the drudgery of the home and becoming the "hewer of wood and the drawer of water." The electrical industry is making more progress to-day than probably any other industry in the country. The time has come when we are going to need and utilize every water power and develop every stream in the country.

In 1869 our industries employed only about 2,350,000 primary horsepower, while at the last census in 1919 our industries employed nearly 30,000,000 primary horsepower, an increase of about 1,200 per cent. The use of electricity in manufacturing operations was first noticeable in 1889, when the census returns showed approximately 15,600 horsepower of electrical energy employed in manufacturing. At the last census in 1919, after a lapse of 30 years, this electrical power had grown to 16,317,000 horsepower. In other words, the last census showed that something over 55 per cent of the power used by our industries was electrical energy, and the increase during the last 10 years has been very rapid and enormous.

The value of all of our agricultural crops in 1899 was about $3,000,000,000. Twenty years later it was about $15,500,000,000, but our manufactured products, which in 1899 had a value totaling $11,400,000,000, reached the enormous total of $62,400,000,000 in 1919, or more than four times the value of all our farm crops put together. The figures for farm crops do not include livestock. The importance of fully utilizing our power resources, therefore, can not be overestimated.

Who knows the power resources of our country?

Nobody. Many guesses have been made. For example, on the Tennessee the highest estimate was 1,900,000 horsepower, and a careful, detailed study, authorized by Congress, has shown that outside of Muscle Shoals the Tennessee River has 58 dam sites and more than 3,000,000 horsepower available. The same results, in proportion, may be found in other sections of the country. It appears that 72 per cent of the power now developed in this country is east of the Mississippi River, while 79 per cent of our potential power is in the West. This study or survey will point the way for capital interested in power development; it will show the potential power existing throughout the various sections of the country, and will not only mean the conservation of power resources but show the best plan for developing and using our inland streams to their maximum capacity for navigation, flood control, and irrigation as well.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Just as business has developed at Niagara, where we can develop 3,000,000 horsepower and supply a more beautiful and wonderful waterfall than we have ever had in all the history of Niagara.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, let me call attention to one more thought I have, and that is the vast use of our inland streams, connecting channels, the lake and coast harbors. Last year we carried on our water courses and our harbors more tonnage than ever before in the history of this Nation. That tonnage was carried at a saving to the producer and the consumer of many times the amount carried in this bill. Shall the greatest and the richest Nation in the world, worth some four hundred billions of dollars, hesitate to spend a few more million dollars in a work that is so all important as this? Last year we appropriated nearly four billions for the expenses and all governmental activities. Out of every dollar we used only 12½ mills for river and harbor development. If you put 540,000,000 tons of commerce in railroad cars, 30 tons for each car, you would have 18,000,000 carloads. This vast tonnage had a value of more than $27,000,000,000. Shall we hesitate? We can find money enough to put $7,000,000 and more down here on the Avenue, to buy or condemn a building and to build for the Department of Commerce.

Mr. MADDEN. Seventeen and a half million dollars.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; but you raised the original ten millions seven and a half million dollars, and the amount you found for that raise is what I am talking about now. I do not know where it came from, but I know it appears mighty easy for the Appropriations Committee sometimes to find ample money for other purposes, while they blue-pencil appropriations for something that is bringing a return to the Public Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. It was not so easy.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Well, it was done, and for Lord's sake let us get this amount raised a little.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And does the amount carried in the gentleman's amendment correspond with the recommendation of the engineers?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Did the engineers in making their recommendations take into account the additional projects added since the $50,000,000 was agreed on?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes. I have just read a list of those. The engineers were authorized to submit a $50,000,000 budget, or did submit those figures to the Budget Office. They had estimated $56,000,000 in round numbers, but without reason, without giving any excuse the Budget Office blue-penciled $5,886,000, and said that was as much as we could have for river and harbor work. The committee, of course, followed the Budget. We know the committee likes to follow the Budget and the members do also. We appreciate the work done by that splendid gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and his colleagues on this subcommittee, but none of us are infallible. The subcommittee made a mistake in not providing amounts in accord with the engineers' estimate. Let us provide in this bill sufficient funds to carry on properly this important work for the benefit of all the people of the entire Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are losing sight in this discussion of the real meaning of this amendment. It is not a question of whether this Congress is in favor of developing further river transportation and navigation. The whole question is as to whether the amount carried in the bill will economically and judiciously forward work on inland navigation as well as keep intact the harbors of the coast and the Great Lakes. All of us believe with the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that this is a great problem that is before us, but we sometimes wonder just where he was talking when he made that speech. It made me think of a laborer we had on the farm, when I was a boy, who used to come into the corn field with his overalls on hind-side first, because he said he wanted the wear on both sides.

The bill appropriates $50,000,000 and they say they want more in this amendment because they want to finish certain work. Look at these figures on page 147 of the hearings, part 2, which show from year to year the balance that the engineers have to work on. The balance they say on November 1, 1927, was $56,428,534, and taking out the outstanding liabilities there was left an available balance on that date of $37,291,932.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. In just a moment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to give the gentleman the exact figure.

Mr. HUDSON. Gentlemen on the other side will say that has been allocated. General Jadwin further says, in another place in the report:

> We find we can take these items and through wise discretion change them onto projects that ought to be finished first.

In other words, there is a balance of $37,000,000 which under the wisdom of the engineers can be placed anywhere in the completion of a project. On page 136 he says:

> We have eight or nine times as much work authorized by Congress to be done as we have money available each year for new work, so it gives us quite a good deal of discretion in the matter. We try to go over them all very carefully and recommend what we think is needed on those that are needed the most.

We might increase this amendment by several million dollars, instead of by $6,000,000, and we would not meet all of the demands of these projects.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. In a moment. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] cited these various projects, suggesting that this State should lose so much and that State so much and so on. In the 46 projects there is a difference between the $50,000,000 and the $56,000,000 in round numbers of $2,000,000. The Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, says in a report that it is often found that a project started will not warrant its completion, because there is not enough commerce to warrant it. You can not tell whether this project allocated here in this report will ever go to completion even if we give the other additional $6,000,000.

I read further from the hearings on page 159:

> Mr. BARBOUR. Will the appropriations carried in this bill enable you to carry on the work as expeditiously as heretofore, or possibly even to a greater extent than heretofore, because of the fact that you have a better organization, a better program, and a more smoothly working machine?
> Major ROBINS. Yes, sir. With the $50,000,000 we have had for the last few years, $50,000,000 for next year would enable us to keep our organization intact and our machine going smoothly. It will enable us to carry on the work at the same rate that we have carried it on for the last year.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HUDSON. In a moment. Just one more statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is only one item in this that I am concerned about, and that is in the $50,000,000 from which they are taking the item for a survey. That must be taken out of the $50,000,000, and I will offer an amendment to cover that amount, namely, $2,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair would like now to recognize some gentleman in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CHALMERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment in itself is not of paramount importance, and is important only in this, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and those Members of the House who are in favor of the proper development of water transportation feel that they should give notice to the Budget authorities and to the Committee on Appropriations that they must plan for a sufficient appropriation to take care of the river and harbor projects within a period of five years.

We can not say that we can not afford it. Why, the farmer might just as well say that he could not afford to buy seed corn or seed wheat. I want to say this to the membership of the House: It is a small matter, but we of the Great Lakes States expect to come before the House in a short time for a large appropriation to deepen the lake channels. I introduced a bill in the House about two years ago for a 25-foot channel for the Great Lakes. That bill will probably be reported by the committee within a very few weeks. That project will possibly run into a total of approximately $60,000,000, and if we accomplish it in a five-year period it will cost approximately $12,000,000 annually.

Who can say we can not afford it? The chairman of our committee has stated this afternoon that we handle freight on the Great Lakes at a mill per ton-mile. What does it cost on the railroads? More then ten times that amount.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And three times as much on the sea and five times or six times as much on some of the inland waterways.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to call your attention to the record of 1923 on the Great Lakes. There were 367 lake freighters locking through the Soo Canal and the St. Marys River. I want to give you the draft and the possibilities of these freighters. There were 367, disregarding the class below 2,000 tons. The average cost per ton on all of the tonnage hauled by these freighters amounted to 88 cents; 88 cents a ton for the haul, and the average haul was 801.3 miles. Now, I have figured the capacity of those 367 boats. They were built for greater service than they were able to perform. They were built, or some of them at least, for a draft of 24½ feet, but they were compelled to accommodate themselves that year to an 18¾-foot draft. If we had had a sufficient channel in the Detroit River, at the Limekiln Crossing, the Livingston Channel, in the St. Clair Flats, in the St. Marys River, and the West Neebish Channel, if we had had a sufficient depth, these 367 Lake freighters could have carried 26,000,000 tons additional freight. That additional amount could have been carried with the same crew, the same officers, the same men, and I want to say that the 88 cents a ton covers the loading and unloading of the freight except coal. Before I get through I hope to show that the cost of loading and unloading coal can be almost disregarded. What would have been the saving in actual dollars and cents if we had had the draft to accommodate these big boats?

Let us see what it is worth in dollars and cents, 26,000,000 tons additional and 88 cents a ton. Let us throw off 13 cents for the loading and unloading of coal, and that is ample. I have stood on the bank of the Maumee River and have seen the Hocking Valley and the New York Central derricks load coal into lake freighters. I have seen them load 260 tons of coal in three minutes. Those derricks pick a car right off of the tracks, elevate it, turn it upside down, and drop the coal into the hold of the ship, set the car on the tracks again, and the car will automatically go up an incline and away out to the yard miles away.

Two hundred and sixty tons of coal loaded into a lake freighter every three minutes, and that means 110,000 tons of coal every 24 hours. So 13 cents a ton will amply cover the additional cost of the loading and unloading of the coal. Then we have a clear profit of 75 cents a ton for every ton of extra freight loaded on these 367 boats, which amounts to $25,350,000 a year—not for all time, but for each year. And what is it going to cost to complete the project of the bill for deeper ship channels for the Great Lakes? From Buffalo to Duluth, a distance of 1,000 miles, to Chicago, and to all of the intermediate ports, what is it going to cost? Sixty million dollars, and an annual profit of over $25,000,000. When you add the Lake Michigan tonnage to that of Superior it gives us 33,800,000, tons. So that the entire tonnage saved will be 33,800,000 tons, which, figured at a profit of 75 cents, would amount to $25,350,000.

Do you tell me we can not afford that expenditure for approximately 50 per cent profit each year? So I want to say to the Membership of the House that while this is a small matter on this bill, it will, under the plans of our committee, require an expenditure to complete these projects in a five-year period of approximately $75,000,000. We are to-day simply laying the foundation for future water transportation policy. I thank the committee.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to hold the balance even, politically as well as geographically.

Mr. HASTINGS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think I may say that there is no man in the House who is more deeply interested in flood control than I am. I am interested in the internal development of our country. I do not want to throw an obstacle in the way of it. I am for the internal development of my country, and I have sought on the floor of the House during my brief membership here, to promote that object, and I have voted every dollar of encouragement where I thought the money would be expended for internal improvement.

This amendment is to add $5,886,310 to the $50,000,000. My understanding is that out of this $50,000,000, $1,500,000 will go for certain surveys that are allocated.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If we have this amendment adopted $2,000,000 will be spent for surveys.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the point I am coming to. If this amendment is adopted, $2,000,000 will be allocated to surveys of certain rivers and streams.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a suggestion?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. I propose to offer an amendment that will take care of that proposition.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not voting on future amendments. I am voting on this pending amendment. The point to which I want to invite attention is the injustice of this allocation. I represent in part the State of Oklahoma. That State is a typically Western State. It is deeply interested in the development of the Arkansas River. Let us see what this amendment will do to the second largest tributary of the Mississippi River, next to the Missouri River. Under the $50,000,000 as it stands in this bill a million and a half dollars is allocated to surveys. I invite your attention to pages 156 and 157 of the hearings. Out of that there is allocated to the Arkansas River and its tributaries for surveys what? Fifty thousand dollars. If we adopt this amendment, then I understand $2,000,000 will be taken out of it for surveys. Let us look at the Arkansas River. It gets $50,000 under the one, and if you add the amendment it gets $50,000 out of the $2,000,000. Most other streams get increases for surveys.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to stultify myself by sitting on the floor of this House and permit this discrimination against one of the great rivers of the country, and I am not going to vote for any amendment which does not do justice to the Arkansas and to all other streams.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think he can help the Mississippi flood situation by cutting out $150,000 for a project of mine and vote me out because the gentleman will not get a few dollars more?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will answer that in this way, that we have sat here in patience for years and years; we have tried to lift up our voices for one of the great streams of this country, and we are not going to sit idly by any longer. The voice of the Arkansas River is going to be heard upon this floor, and we are going to demand that justice be done the Arkansas River along with the other streams.

I have been appealing in every way I can for justice to be done to the Arkansas River. Next to the Missouri River, it is the longest tributary of the Mississippi. It is 1,460 miles long. It rises in Colorado and flows through Kansas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, emptying into the Mississippi. Appropriations were made to improve the Arkansas River as far back as 1832 and as far up the river as Wichita, Kans. This major tributary of the Mississippi has been held navigable by the Government for a hundred years. It was actually navigated as far up as Fort Gibson, which is opposite Muskogee, for 75 years. When railroads were built through the country transportation on the river fell into disuse. During the past few years little, if any, appropriations have been made for snagging or keeping the channel open or reveting its banks. During my first term in Congress we succeeded in getting an appropriation of $235,000 for the Arkansas River in Arkansas and Oklahoma. We were not able to force the engineers to expend any of this money on the Arkansas River in Oklahoma. I know that the river is navigable, provided a reasonable amount of money is expended in opening up and keeping clear the main channel of the stream.

Let us examine the allocations found on pages 156 and 157 of the hearings on this bill. I am inserting the tables found in these two pages, which are as follows:

Without this amendment it will be noted there will be allocated to the Arkansas River $50,000. With this amendment adopted there will be allocated to the Arkansas and its tributaries only $50,000. That is what I object to. There is a discrimination against the Arkansas River. There are innumerable small streams mentioned in this table not known out of the county through which they run, and practically every one of them gets an additional amount for a survey if this amendment is adopted.

Take the first one, for instance, the St. Croix. As the bill now stands it gets $5,500. If the amendment is adopted it gets $7,400. The Arkansas River, the second most important tributary of the Mississippi, gets not a single dollar additional if this amendment is adopted. Let us take the Cape Fear River. It gets $7,500. If the amendment is adopted it gets $10,500. Let us take the important River Tickfaw. It gets $3,700. If the amendment is adopted it gets $5,000, or an increase of $1,300. Who knows where this stream is? Then let us take the Amite River. It gets $5,000. If this amendment is adopted it gets $7,000. Search your geography for this river. Let us take the Missouri and its tributaries. It gets $70,000. If the amendment is adopted it gets $90,000. Take nearly all of the other items; the same increase applies. I am not complaining against the amount appropriated for the Missouri and its tributaries, but I do not propose to sit on the floor and permit the Arkansas to be longer discriminated against, and until justice is done the Arkansas River I want to serve notice upon the Members of the House that I am not going to vote for increased allocations for other streams without allocations for the Arkansas River. My State and district are deeply interested in flood-control legislation. I will go as far as any Member of the House in making adequate appropriations for surveys and flood control. I favor river and harbor improvements, and I favor the use of the rivers of our country to cheapen freight rates, but I will not longer sit silent and permit the Arkansas River to be thus discriminated against. The Board of Engineers might as well know that now. Major Putnam in 1915 made an illuminating report, urging additional appropriations for improvements on the Arkansas River. It can be made navigable, and in my judgment it is a mistake not to do so. It is urged that I can get this another year, or out of another appropriation. That does not satisfy me. I have heard that long enough. What we want on the Arkansas River is an adequate appropriation to carry forward the work now. If we do our duty with the Arkansas River and this river is restored to its usefulness, we need not fear but what the coming generation will continue adequate appropriations for it. I want to urge, and repeat again, that no one in Congress is more interested in the internal development of our country than I am; but the members of the Committees on Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control have to be made to understand that the Arkansas River is on the map, and that we must have appropriations for it, and that justice must be done this river while appropriations are being made for the other streams throughout the country. The time to get these appropriations is when bills like this come up for our consideration. I am going to continue to urge as strongly as I may the importance of this river, and, of course, in order to get it improved we must make adequate appropriations for surveys so that correct estimates may be submitted for appropriations.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize it is not a popular thing to come here and oppose an increase in appropriations. Personally I favor the improvement of our rivers and harbors just as rapidly as it can be done in decency and appropriate enough money to reasonably take care of them, but I do not see any sense in going beyond that.

We have heard a little bit about the survey item. I call your attention to the statement of General Jadwin and Major Robins on page 155 of the hearings. In the preliminary allocations of their $50,000,000 they allocated $1,500,000 for surveys, but they kept back about $3,000,000 to be allocated later. General Jadwin says that that $1,500,000 can very readily be increased to $1,800,000 or $2,000,000. That is the survey end of the situation.

I want to go into the status of funds. On pages 158 and 159 you will see that in June, 1925, they had an unexpended balance of $69,471,000 and liabilities and contracts amounting to $21,500,000, or a net amount in the Treasury of $47,900,000. In June, 1926, they had an unexpended balance of $72,433,000 and contracts and liabilities of $17,000,000, or a net unexpended balance of $55,000,000, an increase of $8,000,000 over the year before. In June, 1927, the unexpended balance in the Treasury was $81,000,000, contracts and liabilities $25,000,000, net $56,000,000, an increase of $1,000,000 over the year before. On July 1, 1926, they had unallocated sums from the year before of $668,000. On July 1, 1927, they had unallocated sums of the year before of $2,167,000, an increase all the time.

We are not in a position where we need to increase this appropriation to let them go on in decency with the work. I want to call your attention to one part of the authorization act, which is now section 621 of the code:

> Any public work on canals, rivers, and harbors adopted by Congress may be prosecuted by direct appropriations, by continuing contracts, or by both direct appropriations and continuing contracts.

Which is practically an authorization for the entering into of any work which needs to be done immediately.

I want to call your attention to one other thing. These contracts and these projects can be carried on much better than they could in the years before, because now the department and the contractors have available a great lot of equipment suitable for the projects and they can do a lot more work with the same money. Taking all this into consideration, I think we have carried enough in this appropriation bill and that it should not be increased.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I simply want to answer some of the statements with reference to the amount of the balances which the gentleman who preceded me and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] said were in the Treasury. We brought General Jadwin before our committee and we asked him about the present balance, which is about $69,000,000. Remember, that when he made that report it was July, 1927. In that $69,000,000 was the $50,000,000 that you appropriated last year. Consequently, when you run around to July 1, 1928, you will have spent the $69,000,000, with the exception, probably, of a balance of from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000, which is necessary to run the business. In other words, put it on a business basis. If you are running a wholesale business you have got to have a balance in the bank of $20,000 or $30,000 that you can check against. In a business of this kind, where you are spending $50,000,000 a year, you have to have a balance that you can check against in order to keep your contracts going. This is necessary from a business standpoint, and you can not do business without money. In carrying on this work, if you allowed them to go along in any other way, then by July 1, 1928, the Treasury account they are drawing against would be out of funds. So they are dependent upon the appropriation you are talking about for next year's river and harbor work.

As far as I am concerned, I can get along with the Illinois River and take the reduction. It does not make any difference to me personally, but if you are going to complete these projects, then you must have more money; and, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] has told you, we ought to appropriate at least $65,000,000 a year until we can catch up and get these projects done. If you continue to do it the way you are doing it now, you will waste more by delaying the projects than you will gain.

Let us take the Missouri River as an illustration. Under the proposed plan of $55,886,310 we can probably have the Missouri River dredged so that we can use boats on it in three years' time and give the farmers of the West the opportunity of shipping their grain over that waterway.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I can not yield now.

Therefore I say that letting this thing drag along with small appropriations is on the same principle of a man deciding to build a house and contracting with me to go ahead and build a house for $10,000, but when I have completed the house up to the point of plastering it he would then say to me, "We will not plaster until next year." Would there be any common sense in holding up the construction of a house a whole year because you did not want to plaster it? The same thing is true with respect to this river and harbor proposition.

We had on January 1, $46,000,000 unexpended. Seventeen million dollars of that amount has already been allocated, leaving a balance of $29,000,000 which they will have to use for other projects between now and July 1.

I am making this speech more with the idea of clarifying the thing, if I can, in a common-sense way, and to show that on July 1, 1928, if you did not appropriate any more money, you would be practically out of funds entirely.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not true that the Chief of Engineers reported that for last year they carried over the waterways and through the harbors of the United States, including the Panama Canal, commerce of over 500,000,000 tons, valued at over $26,000,000,000, the greatest ever carried in the history of this country.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is true.

Mr. BRIGGS. Showing the port development and the necessity of transportation facilities within the country.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall only detain you a few moments. I want to address my remarks to this side of the House for the time being, and particularly to the gentlemen who were in the great controversy involving the Illinois River and the lake diversion last Congress.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE] in the facts and figures which he gave here, shows that unless this increase is made, the continuation of the inland waterway beginning in my district is cut to the extent of $150,000 this coming year. This cripples for several years the completion of that great inland waterway.

You gentlemen of the Missouri River territory, you gentlemen of the Illinois River territory, you gentlemen who want to carry through this flood-control program for the Mississippi River, and to the gentleman from Oklahoma who is not satisfied with this amendment because he is not going to get $100,000 but $50,000—think of the situation on the rivers and waterways in my country. We do not get a cent for any survey unless this amendment is passed and are cut $150,000 on the inland waterway appropriation. The gentleman from Oklahoma gets $50,000 for surveys in any event. We have stood with you people on the Mississippi River, we have stood with you on the Missouri River, we have stood with you on the Illinois River, and now we ask you to stand with us on this proposition if you expect us to stand with you in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have just heard from "the boys," or at least one of "the boys" on the Arkansas River who seemed to favor this proposition but was not going to vote for it. You are now going to hear from one of "the boys" on the Mississippi River who is in favor of the amendment and is going to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, some one has said here that the murmur of the waters of the Arkansas flowing down to the Everglades is like the singing of the birds.

Mr. NEWTON. I understand so, but I would like to have it articulated here with a little different kind of note.

Here is the way I look at this proposition, and it is the way I have tried to look at each and every one of these rivers and harbors appropriations for the last several years. We have a policy that has been established by Congress, a legislative policy of authorizing certain projects.

Under the law it is the duty of the Chief of Engineers to study these projects and to annually advise us just how much money he can economically expend in a given year in carrying out the policy of Congress.

During the past several years we have had considerable trouble here in the House in getting the appropriation up to the estimate of the Chief of Engineers. If my recollection serves me correctly, for some two or three successive years the Budget estimates were substantially less than the estimates of the Army engineers. Congress felt that it had laid down the legislative policy and that there should be appropriated sufficient moneys so that that policy could be put into effect. We in the House felt that the judgment of the Army engineers was better than that of the Director of the Budget. On those successive occasions the appropriation was increased so as to conform to the estimates of the Army engineers.

We did not want to override the Budget; neither did we think that the Budget ought to override the express wish of Congress. Happily an understanding was entered into by the rivers group with the executive branch of the Government about two years ago. This understanding in substance called for the completion of the then authorized projects in a period of five years, with an annual appropriation of $50,000,000 for that purpose. As a result of that understanding provision was made for $50,000,000 two years ago with a like sum one year ago.

During the last Congress we passed a new rivers and harbors authorization act. It was the first one of its kind for years. We authorized additional projects aggregating an expenditure of $72,000,000. I voted for that bill, and when I did so I did not have the idea that I was making a mere gesture in favor of the development of our inland waterways. To me it was the commencement of an additional program of river improvement, the commencement of which was to be in the immediate future and the completion of which was to come along in due time. It did not occur to me that the passage of that legislation was going to result in decreasing the expenditures upon existing projects. Certainly no one supporting that measure had any such thought. Congress was announcing a supplemental program of rivers and harbors construction, and we naturally thought it was going to be carried out.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I can not yield until I complete my statement, if the gentleman will permit, and then I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly counted upon the cooperation of the Budget in the carrying out of this express policy of Congress. However, when we came back here this fall we found out that no additional provision had been made for the commencement of any one of these projects. The Budget called for only $50,000,000. This clearly meant that either the earlier program was to be slowed up, or that no work whatever was to start on any of the new projects. This was disappointing. Then, as I looked into the question more closely, I learned that as a matter of fact the Budget was not even recommending for existing projects the sum of $50,000,000, which had been recommended one year and two years ago.

Heretofore it has always been the practice to carry a blanket sum for the projects—this has been $50,000,000 the last two years, as I have said—and an additional sum for the survey items. Whatever was appropriated for surveys was in addition to the sum appropriated for projects. It will be observed that the Budget this year recommended $50,000,000, which was to cover both projects and surveys. Now, the surveys that the Army engineers contemplated making this year and which had been authorized by Congress called for an appropriation of nearly $2,000,000. Therefore, if this appropriation is to stand as it is, the appropriation for the projects that Congress has authorized will have been cut down approximately $2,000,000 less than what they were one and two years ago. This means that we can not even carry out the five-year program that was in existence when the understanding was entered into.

Are we for the improvement and development of our inland waterways or not? Are we merely playing with this proposition? I feel this way about it: The legislative branch of the Government, with the approval of the Executive, has announced the policy. Having announced that policy, we ought to pass an appropriation bill which will carry it out. I have examined the hearings and it is perfectly clear from the testimony of General Jadwin that he and his assistants feel that if this policy of Congress is going to be carried out in an efficient and economical way that the appropriation ought to be $55,800,000. When General Jadwin so reports, he does so with the full appreciation of the responsibilities of his position. He knows the situation. He knows what his job is. He knows where his equipment is, where his help is located. He ought to know more than anyone else how this program can be economically and efficiently carried out if the policy of Congress is to be carried out.

I believe in the development of our inland waterways. There is not a day hardly but what information comes to me of the extreme desirability, if not necessity, to the industrial and agricultural interests of the Middle West for cheaper and more adequate transportation. The products of our farms come into competition on our eastern and western coasts with the farm products of foreign countries. These countries have a cheap ocean freight haul to our coast, whereas our farmers have an expensive railroad freight haul. Therefore I want to see these projects which Congress has started finished just as soon as they can be economically finished.

Mr. HUDSON. Does the gentleman think the addition of $6,000,000 is a proper ratio for the $72,000,000? If you will make the basis of the change $72,000,000, I will vote for ten or fifteen million dollars to do it.

Mr. NEWTON. Here is the situation: We are never going to complete these projects unless we get the money, and we have not got the money this year that we had two years ago. Let me ask the gentleman, Does he think that in this bill we ought to take less than we had a year ago and less than we had two years ago?

Mr. HUDSON. No——

Mr. NEWTON. Then the gentleman very clearly ought to vote for our amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSON. No; because the engineer has said that the machinery set up could use $50,000,000.

Mr. NEWTON. Oh, no!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, anybody who has read the hearings before the Appropriations Committee with reference to river and harbor items ought to be convinced that the amount of $50,000,000 is altogether insufficient.

Mr. Robbins, for the Chief of Engineers, testified that with an annual appropriation of only $50,000,000 it would take eight or nine years to complete the new work now in sight.

This appropriation of only $50,000,000 proposed by the committee denies the completion of new projects within a reasonable time as outlined by the Chief of Engineers. Of course, Members of Congress must know that these balances in the hands of the Chief of Engineers which we have been hearing about are not surplus funds which can be added to the appropriation carried in this bill. They are balances not available to new authorized projects; they are balances which represent commitments already made; obligated funds and funds yet to be allocated for maintenance and carrying on river and harbor work throughout the remainder of the whole fiscal year ending June 30, 1928.

When you state that a large balance existed on the 1st of November, you must remember that the engineers have to carry through project work until the 1st of July out of that appropriation. It must be further remembered the engineers tell you that they can not do as much work in the colder season of the year as they are able to do in the warmer season, and they do practically double the work in the summer months that they do in the winter months. If you test your balance in the winter, you are taking out of the equation that feature which is so sharply emphasized by the engineers.

It seems to me penny-wise and pound foolish to be postponing the completion of these projects adopted by the Congress, and which represent urgent need of the improvements authorized.

The Chief of Engineers calls attention in his testimony to the fact that where they have plans ready to carry through this work it means an actual loss to the Government not to carry them through in accordance with the plans as contemplated. He says, page 152 of the hearings:

> If that plant is not employed continuously somebody has to pay for it, and in the long run the Government must pay for it in the cost of the work, because you will get less work for the money. From our experience in the past we have found that when the appropriations were dropped they were discontinued, and it is hard to get the work done at the right prices under those conditions.

Not a great many of our citizens probably are familiar with the tremendous commerce moving over the waterways of the Nation, and through its great ports.

The 1927 report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, page 3, volume 2 of such report, reflects that the commerce of the United States during the calendar year 1926 amounted to the vast total of 540,500,000 tons, valued at $26,722,000,000, which the Chief of Engineers, in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee of this House, further stated was the greatest amount of commerce ever before carried in the history of this country.

There is probably no service by the Government which has produced greater returns for the people than is exemplified in the great river and harbor projects of the Nation.

Without the existence of deep-water ports the great foreign or coastwise trade of the United States could never have been developed to anything like its present proportions.

Foreign goods moving through such national gateways as Galveston, Texas City, New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and other great ports, are paying custom duties into the United States of over $500,000,000 a year.

In addition to such enormous sum in custom receipts so collected, the great river and harbor national gateways have exercised a tremendous influence in the reduction of freight rates to and from the ports, and have further resulted in the rapid development and increased wealth of the territory within the States contiguous or adjacent thereto.

The United States engineers have officially indicated that the creation of the great port of Galveston has resulted in rate reductions amounting from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually; a saving to the people in one year of the total cost of the river and harbor improvement at Galveston throughout its whole history.

The Chief of Engineers has indicated plainly that, if the proposed river and harbor appropriation for all the waterways of this country is not increased from $50,000,000 to $55,000,000, the completion of the new work authorized in the last river and harbor bill, with other projects, will be materially delayed.

Instead of being able to allocate the sum of $621,000 for completion of the 32-foot project at Galveston within the next year, the Chief of Engineers has notified Congress that only $550,000 can be allocated to this most important improvement at the port of Galveston, which has recently attained the distinction of handling more than a billion dollars of commerce in one year.

In the last eight years commerce through the port of Galveston has practically doubled; and when Congress last year learned how great and increasing a service it was performing for the Nation, and particularly for the southwestern part thereof, and how great a need for an even deeper channel existed, it directed an increase of the project depth in Galveston Channel as well as an increased depth in Galveston Harbor. It is urgent that the money for this and other projects authorized should be provided with the least possible delay, so that such projects can be promptly carried to completion.

The testimony of the Chief of Engineers and his assistants have demonstrated beyond question that funds on hand are only sufficient to carry on the work estimated for in the last Army appropriation bill, and that it is absolutely essential that the customary reserve be maintained in order that the engineers will at all times have some funds on hand with which to meet unexpected and very serious situations in the maintenance of the river and harbor work of the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As a matter of fact, at the end of each fiscal year the only money unallocated by the engineers is the amount of approximately $5,000,000, which they must keep for emergency purposes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly; they must have a reserve fund, and they testified in these hearings that if they had not done that, they could not have carried through the relief and survey work which they did on the Mississippi last summer after that terrible flood. The Congress of the United States was not in session, and there was no source to which they could turn except to the reserves held by the engineers, and through the use of those reserves the work was accomplished.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. No. I am sorry I can not. My time is too limited.

Mr. HUDSON. I would like to call attention to the fact that "allocated" is not "contracted."

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that perfectly, but the allocation of these funds to other projects delays matters. The great Intercoastal Canal has allocated to it a sum of money, and they are waiting now only for the rights of way. If you transfer that allotment to some other project, you will have seriously delayed the completion of that great project. You are not carrying out your program, but you are procrastinating and delaying your program by such a course, and this Congress ought to adopt this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anything that I can say at this time that will change anyone's vote on this amendment. It is one of the river and harbor proposals which always bring a big crowd to the floor of the House, and always cause more or less enthusiasm; but there is no occasion for any enthusiasm on the part of the average Member interested in river and harbor projects in this amendment. My good friend from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] made a fine speech about the Great Lakes and the necessity for the deepening of the channels and harbors of the Great Lakes. If this amendment is adopted, the Great Lakes are not going to get any of it to speak of. The amount that would go to that section of the country would not make a ripple in a fish pond, let alone do any good to the Great Lakes. The amount that would go to the great majority of the projects in this country that you gentlemen are interested in would not make any difference at all if you should get any of this $5,586,310. What are they going to do with this money if the amendment is adopted? You will find at page 294 of the hearings General Jadwin said:

> It was my further intention, had the $5,000,000 increase in the appropriation been approved, to allot from that about $2,000,000, so that they would have pretty close to $5,000,000 instead of $3,000,000 allotted the coming year.

He was talking about the Missouri River between Kansas City and the mouth. Two million dollars of your $5,000,000 is going into that one project.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. No. General Jadwin further said:

> Allotting the remaining $3,000,000 of the $5,000,000 to other works would then have given approximately the same ratio in which the $50,000,000 is allotted; since the $50,000,000 is divided, about $20,000,000 in the Mississippi system and about $30,000,000 to the Great Lakes and the works on the three coasts.

According to that statement the Missouri River below Kansas City is going to get $2,000,000 and the whole Mississippi system is going to get about $1,300,000 of the $5,585,000 in addition to what it will get under the $50,000,000, and then all of the rest of the country, the Great Lakes included, I will say to my friend from Ohio, and all of the Atlantic coast and all of the Gulf coast, down in my friend McDUFFIE's section of the country, and all of the Pacific coast——

Mr. McDUFFIE. It does not affect my district at all.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not yet yielded. All of these sections of the country are going to get about $2,300,000. Gentlemen, what do you expect to get in this division of the $5,558,000? Ninety-five per cent of you are not going to get any benefit worth mentioning. Major Robins testified before the committee that the only thing the $50,000,000 will not do is to enable them to rush certain important projects that there is a great demand for. So if you get your additional $5,558,310 the only thing which they can do which they could not otherwise do would be the rush of a few of the projects.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has referred to me. Will he yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I just wanted to say this, that we of the Great Lakes are looking to the future.

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, that is a good time to look to, and not the present, in regard to this appropriation.

Mr. HUDSON. And if the House will adopt my amendment, it takes care of that very thing that the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely.

Mr. HUDSON. That $2,000,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. Gentlemen, there is a regular, businesslike way of doing this. The committee has been appropriating for the last two or three years $50,000,000 a year for rivers and harbors. A few years ago the appropriation bills for the War Department carried $40,000,000 a year for river and harbor work. Then there came before the committee certain Members of the House who were interested in the waterways of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. These gentlemen came before the committee. They did not represent the Rivers and Harbors Committee; they did not represent anybody, probably, but themselves; but they told the committee that if it would increase the appropriation to $50,000,000 a year all of the work that was necessary to be done would be taken care of. I know the answer to that is that since that time we have authorized new projects. Then the businesslike way of handling those new prospects is to go through the Budget and come here to Congress with estimates. If we now tie onto this bill this additional $5,586,310 for certain favored projects, it is going to establish a precedent that will do us no good in the future, because when a river and harbor appropriation comes in hereafter it will not go through with orderly consideration, but everyone who has a favorite project will then have this precedent before him for adding to the appropriation and tying his favorite project onto the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman stated that nobody would get any benefit with the exception of one or two projects.

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, say three or four.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 151 of the hearings, where practically $2,000,000 is taken off the projects adopted in the last bill, to say nothing of the projects existing when the later projects were adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. For surveys?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not altogether for surveys.

Mr. BARBOUR. But there were many of these projects that did not deserve very much consideration anyway. I am discussing the matter of where this $5,558,000 is going. It is going to a few favored projects, and the rest of the projects are not going to get any benefit from it at all worth mentioning.

Gentlemen, you are soon coming to this Congress with a program for flood control, to cost anywhere from $275,000,000 to $1,250,000,000, according to the estimates that have been submitted. Congress is going to meet that problem, and I confidently believe that Congress is going to provide a program for adequate relief. It is going to cost a lot of money. Why not take up this matter in a businesslike way instead of gouging here and there for particular projects? Why not wait and meet that problem when it comes, and take care of all projects in a businesslike manner?

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. MOREHEAD. The gentleman spoke of the Missouri River, as I thought, in a rather light way.

Mr. BARBOUR. No. I think that is one of the important projects before us.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I want to say that the States bordering on the Missouri River produce 45 per cent of all the agricultural products in the United States, and that particular section of the river which we hope will be made navigable will enable us to secure a reduction in the cost of transportation. The people of that section now are paying the highest freight rates, and we think it would be of great benefit to the agricultural interests of the country if that improvement were made.

Mr. BARBOUR. I had no intention of speaking lightly of the Missouri River, because in my opinion the project below Kansas City is one of the most important in the country.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Is it not true that if we have the $5,558,000 granted we deduct 10 per cent off all the projects?

Mr. BARBOUR. That means that when we allocate to these different projects, 10 per cent will be deducted for contingencies.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. As a rule all the projects that are included now will be affected.

Mr. BARBOUR. That will provide even less money for the Great Lakes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The gentleman stated nobody will get any benefit from this. I say they will all get benefit from it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I say the average run of river and harbor projects throughout the country will not get any benefit from this amendment worth mentioning.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I disagree with the gentleman on that. I think all will benefit from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSON to the amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: In lieu of the sum proposed in the said amendment insert "$52,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 130.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 140, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MUSCLE SHOALS

For operating, maintaining, and keeping in repair the works at Dam No. 2, Tennessee River, including the hydroelectrical development, $275,000, to remain available until June 30, 1929, and to be exepnded under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to correct the spelling of the word "expended" in line 15, page 79.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eastern Branch, Togus, Me.: Current expenses, $57,500;
Subsistense, $113,000;
Household, $105,000;
Hospital, $72,000;
Transportation, $500;
Repairs, $35,000;
Farm, $26,000;
In all, Eastern Branch, $409,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word "subsistence" in line 17 of page 83.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction in the spelling.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Marion Branch, Marion, Ind.: Current expenses, $57,000;
Subsistence, $260,000;
Household, $105,000;
Hospital, $1,006,000, of which sum there shall be available immediately $600,000 for the construction of three cottages, with an aggregate capacity of 200 beds, and $100,000 for the construction of a sanitary fireproof annex to the present hospital with a capacity of 50 beds, including on account of each of such projects the construction of such necessary approach work, roadways, and other facilities leading thereto, heating and ventilating apparatus, furniture, equipment, and accessories as may be approved by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon request of the Board of Managers, may have all architectural and inspection work in connection with the work herein provided for performed by the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department and the proper appropriations of that office may be reimbursed from this appropiation on that account;
Transportation, $1,000;
Repairs, $55,000.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, not a few Members of the House are interested in the program of hospital construction now being considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. I speak at this point in order to call your attention to the anomalous situation presented by the items here for support of the hospitals connected with the 10 National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, commonly spoken of as the soldiers' homes. The hospital items amount to $2,902,000, being almost exactly one-third of the total for the homes—$8,500,300. Omitting the construction item of $700,000 for the home at Marion, Ind., from both figures, they would be, respectively, $2,200,000 and $7,800,300, making the hospital maintenance cost 28 per cent of the whole. There are in these hospitals about 1,735 Veterans' Bureau patients—that is, World War veterans. In the haste of the war several of these hospitals were built on the grounds of soldiers' homes as a matter of convenience. They and their occupants are not now under the jurisdiction and control of the Veterans' Bureau, as they should be. By reason of this the bureau can not use all the hospital resources owned by the Federal Government to the best advantage of the suffering victims of the World War.

Better classification of patients could be made, more beds would be available where most needed, the convenience of friends and relatives of patients could be more subserved, less expenditure for new construction would be required—in short, the needs of World War veterans could be more efficiently and more economically met if all the hospital facilities owned by the Government should be brought under one control. I am taking this opportunity to inform the Members of the House that the possibility of legislation to this end is under consideration by the subcommittee of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation that is studying the hospital-construction program, and to bespeak for it the attention of the House in case it should be reported.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman going to make a motion to strike out the item in this bill?

Mr. LUCE. Not at all. It is simply a pro forma amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought perhaps the gentleman wanted to cut the bill down.

Mr. LUCE. No. I do not desire to disturb the appropriation. I was informing the House that an attempt may be made to get the approval of the House for some method of meeting the situation. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Panama Canal, $8,660,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have not read the bill for agricultural relief of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], but if it does undertake and look to accomplish the object he has in mind, it will be a godsend and a blessing to the farm people of the country, because it will help not only the producers of cotton but the lesson it will teach will be of untold value to the producers of agricultural commodities throughout the Nation and the world.

Let me call your attention to this remarkable fact: There is no exchange for dealing in speculative margins on any products under the sun save the products of the farmer. Now, think of that! Just as a mere matter of pure logic and reason you would think that the speculation would be in the commodities which are ready for the market, ready to sell, ready to use, and you would think that the speculation would be in shoes and not in hides; you would think the speculation would be in shirts and not in raw cotton; you would think the speculation would be in oil and not in the raw cottonseed; you would think the speculation would be in flour already for use and in the barrel or in the sack and not in the wheat in the elevator. Yet, as a matter of fact, there is no speculation on any of the finished products. What would happen if there should be set up in New York or Chicago or Pittsburgh an exchange to speculate on future marginal contracts relating to steel? How long would such an exchange be able to pay the rent, much less the other overhead expense of an exchange that proposed to deal in steel? Who fixes the price of steel? The manufacturers regulate it, of course, by the slow process of supply and demand. In order that the great plants may not be completely shut down they will slowly, under conditions, let down the price to satisfy the consuming public, but no class, whether steel producers or shoe producers, clothing producers, flour millers, or other finished-product manufacturers, is subject to the fluctuating, irrational, vacillating prices that are produced by speculative marginal futures contracts.

Now, why have they picked out from all the producers of the world those who produce the raw products of the farm? Because of the simple fact that the farmer in his unorganized, solitary state of production is unable to defend himself from the fluctuating prices that the purely speculative futures contract imposes upon him. He is utterly helpless. Therefore those who have not spun yet are clothed in raiment and fine linen at the expense of the fellow who has produced it, who has labored, who has cooperated with God in the bringing into existence of something which was not. They take advantage of him who is helpless as he stands before the arbitrary, artificial, economic forces of combined financial power, just as he was helpless as he stood when God sent the hail or sent the windstorm or sent the flood or sent the drought. He stands helpless, solitary, alone in his distress against the combined forces of nature and of man.

Why, it seems to me, my friends, if there is anything that the power of government ought to do, it is to reach out with a strong arm and protect against those who seek to profit from the labors of the man who has stood alone to bring into existence that which was not, and which are necessary to man's life, and to save him and to protect him from these fluctuations, these unnecessary, these unjust fluctuations that the combined power of wealth can bring to bear down prices when they use the money that they can borrow on short-term loans with the securities which are the property of the people themselves, to wit, their own products, thus using our crops to depress the prices. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition there is appropriated for the operation, maintenance, and extension of waterworks, sewers, and pavements in the cities of Panama and Colon, during the fiscal year 1929, the necessary portions of such sums as shall be paid as water rentals or directly by the Government of Panama for such expenses.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: On page 92, line 22, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Without authorization by Congress no part of the funds appropriated by this act shall be expended in the transportation of any portion of the armed forces provided for in this act to the territory of a foreign country over which the United States does not now possess sovereign jurisdiction."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is legislation, and particularly call attention to the first four words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes a point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman from Mississippi wish to be heard?

Mr. COLLINS. I think it is a limitation on the appropriation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite the Chair to any precedent sustaining his contention?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is clearly a limitation upon the funds carried in the bill. The first four words to which the gentleman has called attention do not change the character of it at all and do not make it legislation in any way. The meaning of it is that no part of the appropriations made in the bill shall be used to pay for the transportation of troops within a certain area therein defined. The words "without authorization of Congress" do not change the character of the limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, of course, realizes that aside from the four words which were specially called to the attention of the Chair it is clearly a limitation couched in the usual language of a limitation. Whether these four words affect the case is, of course, the question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not see how they possibly can.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest, in emphasizing what has just been said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that the point of order can not be well taken with respect to the words in question for this reason: If the words were not used, nevertheless it would be implied and recognized that Congress has full jurisdiction. The use of the words, therefore, can not in any substantial way affect the proposal that is covered by the amendment.

If the words are used "without the authority of Congress," it is expressly stated that the subject is entirely within the power of Congress to be dealt with as it thinks proper. On the other hand, if the words are not used, it is equally the case that the subject rests with Congress to deal with it as it may think proper. Accordingly, there is an utter absence of logic in the proposition raised by the point of order.

Mr. BARBOUR. It seems to me that under the present law we have authority to send troops to foreign countries without a special act of Congress. But here is the point that occurs to me: The amendment might be construed so that we could not send a military attaché abroad, and that would clearly be a change of the law which authorizes the sending of military attachés, who are a part of the armed forces. An Army officer in active service who is designated as military attaché is a part of the armed forces of the country.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest a thought for the consideration of the Chair: With the four words referred to, can the Chair say that the amendment shows on its face that it will necessarily reduce expenditures or limit the appropriation? Does the Chair know whether or not Congress has authorized the use of the money in the way that the amendment suggests? If it has, then the amendment would not reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman have in mind that already under existing law Congress may have fully authorized the Executive to send armed forces to these countries, and that even though the amendment passed carrying these four words he would still have the same authority to send these forces abroad?

Mr. MAPES. For all that the Chair may know, I doubt whether the Chair can say that on its face the amendment is a limitation of appropriation, because the law already may authorize the President to do that very thing.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be true, but it seems to the Chair that that fact would not affect the ruling. The question is whether under the guise of a limitation an attempt is here made to enact legislation or to change existing law. With such examination as the Chair has been able to make, he is not able to find a decision that would warrant holding that including these four words would so change the law. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not agree on some time to discuss this amendment?

Mr. BARBOUR. How would five minutes on a side suit the gentleman?

Mr. COLLINS. I would like at least 30 or 40 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. We can not finish the bill to-night if we take such time to discuss an amendment under the 5-minute rule. I would consent to 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. COLLINS. But there are a half dozen Members on this side who want to speak.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am willing to agree to 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. COLLINS. This is a very important amendment, and there are at least a half dozen Members on this side that want time, and I think we will consume more than that time, in my opinion, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BARBOUR. We have been very liberal on this bill. There has been no request for time on the part of anybody that has not been granted. This is the sixth day we have spent considering this bill. Every man who has asked for additional time has had it without objection. We are coming to the point now where we ought to finish the bill, and we are within two pages of the end. Any reasonable request will not be objected to.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman say 20 minutes on a side?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I will consent to 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, we will take the 15 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be used by those supporting the amendment and 15 minutes by those opposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States clothes Congress with the exclusive function of declaring war. The purpose of this amendment is to reassert that constitutional responsibility.

The tendency is growing in this country for the absorption by the Executive of the powers that belong to the legislative branch of the Government. The tendency is increasing for the President not to ask the consent of Congress whether he shall carry on war, but to proceed on his own initiative to use our armed forces in military enterprises in foreign countries. Shall we allow that practice to increase, or shall we ask for a return to the fundamental principles of a democratic government, which clothe the representatives of the people with the right to say when our country shall go to war?

The tendency is to leave to Congress merely the poor function of declaring the legal state of war, while the Executive proceeds to do the things which bring on war and to take actions to conduct that war. It is now within the technical power of the President to send our armed forces to any part of the world if he may choose. To-morrow he may send them for an invasion of Canada, or he may send our fleet to bombard London. He has the technical authority to so complicate our affairs by a pernicious military activity as to virtually make of himself a dictator and to bring us into conflict with the whole world. The founders of the Republic never intended to place such powers in the Executive. They are powers which those who love the Constitution and intend to abide by its spirit will never accord to the Executive.

This amendment will curb the arbitrary power of the President to make war without the consent of Congress. If there be any among us who believe in the American system, a system of divided responsibility, in which each branch of the Government shall be separate within its own sphere and function, I ask them, Will you not now vote to show your faith?

Are you willing that the President shall make war without the consent of Congress? If you are, then let things go as they are. If you are willing to abdicate your sworn responsibility as representatives of the people, then vote against this amendment. But if you believe in Americanism, if you hold to the fundamentals on which our country was founded, if you adhere to the faith of the fathers, then I beg you do not forget it now. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is an attempt under the guise of a limitation upon an appropriation bill to restrict and limit the President of the United States in the discharge of a constitutional duty. It is an attempt to have Congress do indirectly what it could not constitutionally do directly.

Under our Constitution the executive powers of Government are granted to the President. He is made the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. In my judgment, this is in effect a violation of the constitutional powers of the Commander in Chief.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it is clear that this is aimed at the President in the present effort he is making to bring order out of chaos and to protect American life and property in one of the Central American countries. There is no one who has been to any of those countries that we have occupied for portions of the time who has not been impressed with the character of the work of our Navy and marines and our other armed forces. We have as a Nation a great responsibility, one that we do not merely fulfil at the water's edge. We have responsibilities by reason of the position that we occupy in this hemisphere. This amendment is an attempt to thwart the President of the United States in the effort that he is making, honestly making, in accordance with his ideas of the powers that are conferred upon him to bring order out of chaos in that country.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I, of course, know not what the intent of others may or may not have been. The effect of this amendment, however, would not in any way interfere with the sending of marines to Nicaragua, because this amendment refers to the Army and can only refer to the Army.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is correct; but can the gentleman cite an instance where the present President of the United States has ever sent members of the Army to any foreign country in violation of law?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The language of the amendment recognizes the right to send them where Congress has authorized them to be sent. For instance, they may be sent to Tsientsin, China. There is a treaty authorizing the President to send them there. This in no way interferes with any legal authority now existing authorizing him to send the Army abroad.

Mr. NEWTON. Does the gentleman hold the opinion that the President of the United States is going to send the Army of the United States where he is not authorized to send it, under the law and the Constitution?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Since the gentleman asks me the question, may I say that I have no way of knowing whether he intends to do so or not. So far as I am advised, he has not done so; and so far as I know he has never sent the Army where he was not authorized to send them.

Mr. NEWTON. Then why the occasion for offering this amendment at this time?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. No; I can not yield. Under the Constitution the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and it is his business to use the Army and the Navy in accordance with that Constitution and the laws of the land. Of course, he can abuse those powers.

The Constitution conferred great powers upon the President. These powers can be used or abused. That is true of any person in any public office or private position of trust and responsibility. For that reason the President must answer to the people every four years, and to further guard against abuse of power he is made subject to impeachment.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that a President of the United States has been called a dictator. They repeatedly said it of Lincoln, and I presume it has been said of several others from Lincoln to Wilson. But the mere assertion of the charge did not prove the case. Every Member of this House knows that no just charge of that kind can be made against the present President of the United States. And every citizen knows it also.

At this time, when the Republics of this hemisphere are gathered together in conference in Habana to promote cordiality and good will, with representatives of both of our great political parties in attendance as delegates, it ill behooves this Congress or any Member thereof to attempt to embarrass the President in the discharge of his constitutional duties. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the only possible objection that I could conceive of being offered to this plain declaration of policy would grow out of a possibility that an emergency might arise at some time when the Congress is not in session, and that, to my mind, is not a sufficient reason to justify a vote against this declaration of policy.

Armed intervention of a nation in the affairs of another is war. [Applause.] And any condition that might arise serious enough to justify armed intervention surely is serious enough for the President to ask the counsel of Congress, the constitutional war-declaring part of the Government of the United States. For that reason I have no hesitation whatsoever, standing upon the Constitution of my country, in declaring here in this bill that which I believe to be the law now, which I believe ought to be respected, the organic law of the Republic.

It is not a particular reflection upon the present Executive. I have said before and I say again that I respect the Executive. I respect his office and I respect his person. But as a Member of Congress, charged with a duty to the Constitution itself, I, too, have a right as long as I am a Member to have some voice in saying whether the facts in regard to life and property in another nation justify the sending of the armed forces of my country to intervene in the affairs of another nation.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. On the 31st of January, as I remember, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] made a speech here where this question was involved, wherein he recited, as I remember, 21 cases arising between the year 1895 and the year 1921 where armed forces of the United States had been used outside of the continental limits of the United States for the protection of American life and property, and many of those cases happened when Congress was not in session, most of them being cases of great emergency. Would the gentleman go so far as to say that in cases of that kind, where the situation was sufficiently serious to justify the President of the United States to send our armed forces for the protection of our citizens, he should not have that power?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can make it no stronger, I think, than I made it a moment ago, anticipating that that very question might be asked, or at least might be in the minds of some gentlemen. If there is a situation existing in any country serious enough to justify the sending of armed forces—an act of war—it is serious enough to warrant the calling of Congress in session and having it take action on the matter. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the pending amendment because it involves a proposition that ought to be considered not as an amendment to a great appropriation bill but as an independent proposition referred to an appropriate committee.

No one questions that the war-making power of the Government is rightly vested in the Congress of the United States. No one seeks to disturb the organic law of the country or to modify the time-honored policy of our Government in respecting the organic law. Here is an amendment, however, that is not limited to the uses of the military forces of the United States as agencies of war, but goes so far as to prevent the administration from using the military forces of the United States conceivably in an emergency for the maintenance of peace, for the protection of lives and property of American citizens, and for the preservation of orderly conduct of peoples where otherwise war might ensue.

I doubt not that the proposed amendment is aimed at the administration on account of present conditions where it has been believed necessary by the administration in the preservation of peace to use armed power.

Within the few moments at my disposal it would be impossible for me to begin to outline the situation. This very fact suggests that a proposition so broad as that proposed in the amendment should not be considered under the five-minute rule on a bill to which it does not pertain and at a time when Members generally were not aware that such an amendment was to be proposed.

Generally speaking, the people of the United States have trusted the national administration of whatever party might be in power with discretion in the use of armed forces of the United States for the preservation of peace and order when war was not conceivable and when the use of the armed power has at times been within the United States and at times been within the territories of other countries, where for the time being orderly processes of government had been stayed.

Only a few years ago it was my privilege to visit Santo Domingo, where were stationed a limited number of the armed forces of the United States. Santo Domingo was then, as now, an independent Republic. The limited number of armed forces of our Government, members of the Marine Corps, had been in Santo Domingo maintaining peace and order since 1916. Just prior to their landing in Santo Domingo a coup d'état had occurred which had resulted in the overthrow of the President of the Republic. That was in April, 1916. This revolutionary action was followed by wild lawlessness, and marine forces of the United States were promptly landed, suppressed the uprising, and brought about a condition of orderly processes of government that meant the saving of human life, of citizens of the United States, of citizens of the Republic of Santo Domingo, and of citizens of other nations of the world. The very presence of the marines on that occasion meant peace, not war. Gentlemen of the House, the event to which I refer occurred during the time that the Presidency of the United States was filled by a man belonging to the party of those in this Chamber who are seated on my right, President Wilson. During the balance of the administration of President Wilson and during the administration of President Harding and well into the administration of President Cooldige marines of the United States were maintained in Santo Domingo in carrying out the policy that the Wilson administration believed meant for order, for peace, for humanity.

May I mention another illustration?

A few years ago I was in Haiti, at Port au Prince, and I remember that as I was being driven through one of the streets of the capital of that neighboring Republic there was pointed out to me the building and grounds that had been occupied by the French legation in 1915, and it was pointed out to me that from that home of the French minister to Haiti the President of that little Republic on a night in July, 1915, was seized and assassinated and his body dragged through the streets, from which law and order had fled.

This was part of a debacle that meant the destruction of hundreds of human lives and the utter abandonment of security. Not only was there no protection for citizens of Haiti but the life of no foreign citizen was more secure.

Within two hours after the desperate act of murdering the President had been committed the marines of the United States had landed from a cruiser. Civilization superseded anarchy, and order was restored. [Applause.]

Woodrow Wilson was President of the United States. Gentlemen of this House, we do not know at what moment some disaster may occur in some place where the responsibility should be assumed by one of the strong nations of the world to restore and maintain order.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Not now.

Not only was prompt action taken then, but under the same administration and the succeeding administrations of two different Presidents, under the policy of two political parties, the power of the United States has been present in Haiti for the maintenance not of war but of peace. [Applause.] We were there not for the purpose of destroying life but for the purpose of saving the lives of men, women, and children, at an hour when the hand of Haitian authority had failed.

The responsibility for peace was upon any civilized country; the United States, if you please, and President Wilson did not shrink. More than that, in bringing about peace and stability the Wilson administration and the two succeeding administrations have followed a common program.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Had this amendment been written into the Army appropriation bill at that time, it would not have interfered with the President in the exercise of that authority?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no; because these were marines that were sent there. But the proposition is no different here. Soldiers and marines are both part of the armed forces of the United States. Mr. Chairman, we do not know the day or the hour when in some part of this world of ours mob rule may wipe out orderly government for the time being. The demands of humanity may call for any nation at hand to assume responsibility. Indeed, in the two illustrations to which I have briefly referred—Santo Domingo and Haiti—if the Government of the United States had not interfered some other nation, in all probability, would have assumed the prerogative that was assumed by our Government, and would have protected the lives of men, women, and children at a time when government had been superseded by mob rule. The amendment should not prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I was never freer from any spirit of partisanship in dealing with any matter that has come before the House in my time than I am now. I have not the slightest inclination to visit criticism upon the President of the United States. From what has just been said by the gentleman from Idaho it is quite apparent it would be in vain to try to make this a party question. He has referred to the action of the administration under a Democratic President as well as under Republican Presidents. I believe we ought to treat this proposal very cooly and very deliberately and without any partisan excitement whatever.

Now, what is designed? The amendment seems to have been very carefully worded so as to maintain the authority of the administration to send troops to any nation where the United States is entitled to exercise jurisdiction as, for example, to Cuba and to the Panama Canal Zone. It is simply, as has already been so strongly stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, an attempt to maintain the general principle governing the division of the powers of our Government by asserting and clarifying the power of Congress, so as to have that power less confused than it now is with the power of the Executive. It does nothing more than say that unless the legislative branch of the Government acts, the transportation of troops to another nation shall not be permissible—no more permissible than to declare or wage war in a technical sense without congressional authority.

It is a mere platitude to remark that when the Constitution was framed and adopted the war power was exclusively lodged with Congress upon the fullest consideration of that matter. Is there any gentleman here who wishes Executive practices to continue enabling thoughtful and reasonable men to think and say that the Executive is going a bow shot beyond what was contemplated at the outset in the way of exercising war powers? There is very much discussion of that question in the country and I think we would serve the public interest and tranquillize the situation by removing the opportunity and necessity for any such discussion.

I have looked back over a long stretch of history during which the Executive has sent forces to other nations. I have listened to the illustration just given by the gentleman from Idaho. Taking into account that transaction and all other transactions which have occurred, I fail to find a single instance in which it would not have been entirely possible to obtain the opinion of Congress before the action was taken. Forces can only be sent for one purpose—and no administration has claimed to the contrary—namely, for the purpose of protecting American life and property, not the life and property of a ruler of Haiti or the life and property of other people. I ask gentlemen to cite a case—any case pertinent to the present issue—in which it would not have been entirely possible for Congress to have expressed its view in advance of armed forces being sent abroad.

During a regular session Congress can, of course, act promptly. And should a President at any other time conceive that an armed force should be sent to the territory of another nation, there will be no difficulty in bringing about an extra session. In this day the means of communication and travel make that an easy thing to do.

The opponents of the amendment talk of emergencies, but shall we take counsel of our fear that in some imagined instance events may disastrously outrun the ability of Congress to act? And how unwise it is to stress the inconvenience and expense which may attach to waiting upon action by Congress, and for that or any other reason be willing to continue on a course of gradually but pretty swiftly permitting the Executive to determine under what circumstances hostilities shall be commenced and carried on—activities having all the characteristics and aspects of war, notwithstanding the war power is vested in Congress and nowhere else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, this is not an amendment that should be incorporated in an appropriation bill. It is an amendment that affects our foreign policy. It is a question that should be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and brought before the House in the regular way, considered at length, and the Members of the House fully advised as to what they are voting on. It should not be dragged in here as a rider, you might say, on an appropriation bill. This is no time anyway for legislation of this kind, legislation which is intended to hamper the President of the United States in matters which are now lodged in his discretion, especially when our representatives are gathered with those of our sister Republics of the Western Hemisphere at Habana trying to work out a plan by which we can all dwell in peace and harmony and in a state of mutual respect and good will. I say this is no time for the legislative branch of our Government to be injecting a provision of this kind into an appropriation bill. It seems to me that this amendment might be so construed as to even prevent our sending military attachés abroad. I see the gentleman from Mississippi smiling. It might even go so far, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi, as to prevent our sending Army teams to the Olympic games next year in Europe. Then it would be ridiculous. Who knows when our forces might be called upon to go into a foreign country and upon foreign soil?

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. If a marauding band should cross the Mexican border and this amendment were in effect, it would prevent American troops from pursuing those marauders across the border

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MILLER. I might also suggest the Chinese situation which developed a short time ago.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] calls to mind a very memorable occasion which occurred under the administration of the last Democratic President, when marauding Mexicans did cross our border and murdered several of our own citizens on the American side of the line. If my memory serves me right, Congress was not in session at the time and our President, be it said to his credit, sent American troops into Mexico to try to capture and punish the Mexicans who had invaded our country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was by treaty.

Mr. BARBOUR. Suppose that should happen again when Congress is not in session. With this provision in the bill, before any action could be taken Congress would have to be called in session, consider the question, and pass legislation authorizing the President to send troops into a foreign country.

Mr. Chairman, this provision has no place in an appropriation bill. It should not be passed in this way. If anybody is conscientiously in favor of legislation of this kind, let it be brought in in the regular way and met here on the floor of the House with the arguments for and against it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLINS) there were—ayes 71, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, we demand a separate vote on the Wurzbach amendment, the Speaks amendment, and the McDuffie amendment. It has been suggested that the votes be taken to-morrow. We are going to ask for roll calls. Would it be in order to-morrow to ask for aye and no votes on each of the amendments as they come up?

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, would there be any preference with respect to the gentlemen involved in the several amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPEAKS. Have I the right, Mr. Speaker, to demand a separate vote upon the amendment which I introduced and which was agreed to in the committee?

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman may demand a separate vote on any amendment.

Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, GLASGOW, MONT.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate bill (S. 1501) on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that it may be indefinitely postponed, a similar bill having passed the House and also the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1501) on the Speaker's table be indefinitely postponed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SEARS of Florida, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. CELLER, for one week, on account of sickness.

RESTRICTION OF MEXICAN IMMIGRATION

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by me at an immigration conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, under authority granted by the House, I submit for printing in the RECORD an address delivered by me on January 19, 1928, before the immigration conference held in Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the Key Men of America, a patriotic organization composed of authorized representatives of a great number of other affiliated patriotic societies engaged in the study of immigration problems.

The address is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, during the present session of Congress immigration discussion and legislation will probably center around four important questions:

(1) Shall our deportation laws be strengthened, extended, and better enforced?

(2) Shall the endless chain of relationship existing between immigrants and their kindred abroad be permitted to start dragging out of Europe thousands of those whom the laws now exclude?

(3) Shall we retain in the law the national-origins provisions, written into the act of 1924, making it more accurately and adequately serve the Nation's purpose to keep itself American, or shall they be suspended or repealed at the dictation of certain hyphenated minorities of our population?

(4) Shall the quota provisions of the immigration law be made applicable to Mexico, South America, and adjacent islands?

To this last question I shall devote my brief remarks.

The people of the United States have so definitely determined that immigration shall be rigidly held in check that many who would oppose this settled policy dare not openly attack it. The opposition declares itself in sympathy with the policy and then seeks to break down essential parts of the law and opposes any consistent completion of it making it serve the Nation's purpose to maintain its distinguishing character and institutions. Declaring that they do not believe that paupers and serfs and peons, the ignorant, the diseased, and the criminal of the world should pour by tens and hundreds of thousands into the United States as the decades pass, they nevertheless oppose the stopping of that very class from coming out of Mexico and the West Indies into the country at the rate of 75,000, more or less, per year.

Every reason which calls for the exclusion of the most wretched, ignorant, dirty, diseased, and degraded people of Europe or Asia demands that the illiterate, unclean, peonized masses moving this way from Mexico be stopped at the border. Few will seriously propose the repeal of the immigration laws during the present Congress, but the efforts of those who understand and support the spirit and purpose of these laws to complete them and make them more effective by the application of their quota provisions to Mexico and the West Indies, will be insidiously and strenuously opposed.

The admission of a large and increasing number of Mexican peons to engage in all kinds of work is at variance with the American purpose to protect the wages of its working people and maintain their standard of living. Mexican labor is not free; it is not well paid; its standard of living is low. The yearly admission of several scores of thousands from just across the Mexican border tends constantly to lower the wages and conditions of men and women of America who labor with their hands in industry, in transportation, and in agriculture. One who has been in Mexico or in Mexican sections of cities and towns of southwestern United States enough to make general observation needs no evidence or argument to convince him of the truth of the statement that Mexican peon labor is poorly paid and lives miserably in the midst of want, dirt, and disease.

In industry and transportation they displace great numbers of Americans who are left without employment and drift into poverty, even vagrancy, being unable to maintain families or to help sustain American communities. Volumes of data could be presented by way of support and illustration of this proposition. It is said that farmers need them. On the contrary, American farmers, including those of Texas and the Southwest, as a class do not need them or want them. I state the rule as of country-wide application, without denying that a small percentage of farmers want them, and that in some restricted regions this percentage is considerable. I doubt if a majority of the bona fide farmers of any State want or need them. I have given much attention to the question and am convinced that as a state-wide or nation-wide proposition they are not only not needed and not wanted, but the admission of great numbers of them to engage in agricultural work would be seriously hurtful to the interests of farmers, farm workers, and country communities. They take the places of white Americans in communities and often thereby destroy schools, churches, and all good community life.

American farmers are now burdened with a surplus of staple farm products which they can not sell profitably at home or abroad. That surplus weighs down the prices of the entire crop in both the domestic and foreign markets until it threatens agriculture with financial ruin. Individual farmers, farm organizations, their Representatives in Congress, students of farm economics, bankers, and business men of the farming sections, all are striving to find a means of getting rid of this surplus of farm products, with its dead weight upon the price of farmers' crops. Congress is continually being urged to make appropriations to help carry the farmers' surplus, to levy taxes on farm products, to restrain overproduction, and otherwise to provide a method of getting rid of this oversupply of the farmers' leading crops. The President in his messages to Congress has repeatedly discussed this surplus and dealt with proposed remedies for it.

The importers of such Mexican laborers as go to farms at all want them to increase farm production, not by the labor of American farmers, for the sustenance of families and the support of American farm life, but by serf labor working mainly for absentee landlords on millions of acres of semiarid lands. Many of these lands have heretofore been profitably used for grazing cattle, sheep, and goats. Many of them are held by speculative owners.

A great part of these areas can not be cultivated until the Government has spent vast sums in reclaiming them. Their development when needed as homes for our people and in support of American communities is highly desirable. Their occupation and cultivation by serfs should not be encouraged. These lands and this mass of peon labor are to be exploited in the enlargement of America's surplus farm production, possibly to the increased profit of these speculative owners, but certainly to the great injury of America's present agricultural population, consisting of farmers, living and supporting themselves by their own labor and that of their families, on the farms of America.

The dreaded surplus, which already makes an abundant crop worse for farmers as a whole than a scant one, is to be made more dreadful by the importation of foreign labor working for lower wages and under harder conditions. The surplus which I have mentioned often hurts worse than a pest of locusts on the wheat crop or of boll weevil in the cotton fields.

While farmers, business interests in agricultural sections, Congress, and the President are deep in the consideration of the great problem presented by the farm surplus, and when presidential campaigns may turn on the condition and its consequences, labor importers are scheming and propagandizing for the purpose of bringing in armies of alien peons, claiming that they are needed on the farms, where they would only make the farm-surplus problem worse. If the Government tries to relieve this distress of the farmer caused by surplus production, shall it at the same time be de-Americanizing farms and farming communities and making the surplus and price situation worse by importing masses of serf laborers? Some think that agricultural prices can be sustained by a high tariff. Why have a tariff wall to keep out the products of pauper labor abroad and at the same time be bringing in armies of peons to increase the oversupply inside the tariff wall to the ruin of our own farmers?

Another purpose of the immigration laws is the protection of American racial stock from further degradation or change through mongrelization. The Mexican peon is a mixture of Mediterranean-blooded Spanish peasant with low-grade Indians who did not fight to extinction but submitted and multiplied as serfs. Into that was fused much negro slave blood. This blend of low-grade Spaniard, peonized Indian, and negro slave mixes with negroes, mulatoes, and other mongrels, and some sorry whites, already here. The prevention of such mongrelization and the degradation it causes is one of the purposes of our laws which the admission of these people will tend to defeat.

Every incoming race causes blood mixture, but if this were not true, a mixture of blocs of peoples of different races has a bad effect upon citizenship, creating more race conflicts and weakening national character. This is worse when the newcomers have different and lower social and political ideals. Mexico's Government has always been an expression of Mexican impulses and traditions. Rather, it is an exhibition of the lack of better traditions and the want of intelligence and stamina among the mass of its people. One purpose of our immigration laws is to prevent the lowering of the ideals and the average of our citizenship, the creation of race friction and the weakening of the Nation's powers of cohesion, resulting from the intermixing of differing races. The admission of 75,000 Mexican peons annually tends to the aggravation of this, another evil which the laws are designed to prevent or cure.

To keep out the illiterate and the diseased is another essential part of the Nation's immigration policy. The Mexican peons are illiterate and ignorant. Because of their unsanitary habits and living conditions and their vices they are especially subject to smallpox, venereal diseases, tuberculosis, and other dangerous contagions. Their admission is inconsistent with this phase of our policy.

The protection of American society against the importation of crime and pauperism is yet another object of these laws. Few, if any, other immigrants have brought us so large a proportion of criminals and paupers as have the Mexican peons. If time permitted, I could present masses of authentic reports sustaining the truth of this statement. As one of a great many instances, I read a news item from the Dallas News of January 5, 1928:

MEXICANS SUFFERING FROM UNEMPLOYMENT, AGENCY MAN REPORTS

"Unemployment conditions among Mexicans in Dallas is the most acute in the history of 'Little Mexico,' A. Luna, operator of an employment agency, said Wednesday. He declared that hundreds of families are suffering severely, especially on account of the recent cold weather.

"'These people are badly in need of immediate relief,' Mr. Luna said, 'perhaps much more relief than is now available.'"

Note the term "Little Mexico" used in this news item. These "Little Mexicos" are springing up in many sections in and about the cities and industrial centers and all over the Nation. Some of them are assuming large proportions, and all of them together are becoming disturbingly large.

The number of such reports coming from California, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and the whole Southwest, through the press and from public and private charity organizations, is very great and covers the whole period of mass peon immigration from its beginning until now.

The statements made in connection with each of these propositions are presented to this company, containing many students of the problem and a large percentage of those with whom the present and future public welfare is a paramount consideration, with the assurance that such citizens will give further attention to the question and disprove or verify the statements made.

The volume of Mexican immigration, the attending circumstances, and the prospects for its continuance and enlargement are such as to make this an important part of one of the Nation's greatest problems. Mexico has nearly 15,000,000 people who are prolific breeders, capable of producing millions of new inhabitants every year.

Their economic condition will continue worse than ours for an indefinite time and cause their laborers to want to migrate to the United States. Under a well-known law of population, the gaps left at home by those who come from year to year will be rapidly refilled by a natural increase. Thus Mexico will become an inexhaustible source of this low-grade immigration.

Immigrants who have poured upon our shores from Europe and Old World countries have had to pay the expense of land travel in reaching foreign seaports, after which the heavy expense of ocean transportation had to be paid. Mexico's masses have only to tramp to the border. The expense of their transportation, whether paid by them or others, is trifling compared to the cost of crossing the ocean from Europe or Asia to America. The methods by which labor importers reach them and induce them to come are inexpensive and easy. The building of barriers against the flood flowing in from elsewhere must increase the inpouring from Mexico. Unless it is checked it will continue with increasing volume.

The most dangerous mass immigration now menacing us is that from Mexico.

Our efforts to deal wisely and adequately with Mexican peon immigration from the standpoint of public and patriotic interest are opposed by the same selfish interests which have hindered all the Nation's efforts in dealing with our immigration, namely, the short-sighted, present profit-seeking interests of those who want cheap labor. If it were not for this opposition, the grave question which I am suggesting would be settled soon and the settlement made would be with a patriotic view to the public welfare now and hereafter.

If we ask Mexico, Haiti, Cuba, and South America to consent to the application of this necessary restriction, they will, of course, refuse and the evil stream will continue to pour its pollution into the mass of our population.

Efforts to obtain the consent of foreign countries to our immigration policy have been an unbroken failure throughout the history of our dealing with the problem. More than one presidential administration tried to settle the Chinese immigration question by the Burlingame treaty, in which it was recited that the right of races to migrate was inherent and inalienable. This was to apply as between the hundreds of Chinese millions and America. The United States Congress had to cut the Nation's way out of that ruinous entanglement.

Italy did not consent to our present law, but wanted to handle the subject by treaty to which her consent would be necessary, but the Constitution had vested this power in Congress, and Congress exercised it, accomplishing the Nation's purpose and helping to save its future. Other instances could be cited; one more will be enough. Japan had interests and a will concerning Japanese immigration in conflict with the interests and will of the United States. Every effort was made to avoid having America declare its will by congressional action as our Constitution contemplates. So long as we dickered with that question, consulting any but our constitutional rule, it remained unsettled and troublesome. It would have been with us yet had Congress waited for the consent of a foreign power or left that question to be settled in any but the constitutional way; but the will of America was accomplished in the manner provided by the fathers. The world did not crumble, its peace was not disturbed, but our friends of former times remain our friends, respecting us and being by us respected. Any other course would have continued the question and the irritation it caused.

These and other national experiences in dealing with the immigration problem should be recalled by the public when men say that in this instance we must consult the wishes of the people south of the Rio Grande or farther south.

Ladies and gentlemen, practically all of the reasons which have moved the United States to adopt and adhere to the policy of restricting immigration from Europe and Asia argue for the restriction of peon immigration from Mexico and the countries to the south and east. The difficulties which folly and greed have heretofore thrown in the Nation's path are being thrown in its way now. Let us hope that the people of these times and the membership of this Congress will be as wise and courageous as those who have preceded us.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT] may file minority views on the so-called market site bill, and that I may have the privilege also of filing separate minority views on the same bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT] and himself may file separate minority views on the market site bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include my speech before the Committee on Agriculture on February 9, 1928, which is as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thank you for giving me this opportunity to make a few observations in reference to agricultural legislation, and I thank also the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KETCHAM.

Probably most of you know I voted against the McNary-Haugen bill. I have been abused by many cooperative representatives here who are drawing pretty handsome salaries. But I have been trying to vote for the farmer, whether he belonged to a cooperative organization or not; and what I wanted to suggest to the committee this morning is that it seems to me as a Member of Congress that it is about time for this committee and for the Congress to quit fooling the farmer and really pass some practical measure that stands some chance of becoming a law.

We know when the Haugen bill was up before, a lot of gentlemen said that the President would veto it; a great many others just as solemnly, who had been down and eaten some corn cakes with the President a few mornings, were just as sure he was going to approve it. It was easy for those who voted either way to console themselves. But we know now that he did veto it and we know now that if he did have the nerve to veto it once he has got nerve enough to veto it again. It would be very easy for us to come along and say, "We will have the McNary-Haugen bill or nothing, and we will take it over and put it on the President's doorstep and let him veto it if he wants to." That will get you some farmer votes probably; it will get you the loyal devotion of some cooperatives, and a lot of them that do not understand the situation will still vote for you. But for the farmer who is on the farm that really wants some action, that is not going to get you very far as soon as he finds out the truth about the thing. That is what the "co-ops" did last year. They demanded the Haugen bill or nothing, and they got nothing.

I have been down mixing among the farmers. They are not fools; they are not all being fooled by these maneuvers of political farmers up here in Washington. There is a whole lot of difference between a high-salaried lobbyist, whose job will play out as soon as real relief is granted, and the farmer back home who works on the farm with his hands.

I know something about farming. I have got a farm myself; my wife has got a farm; and I have been on that farm this fall and up to pretty recently terracing it and looking after it and trying to put it in shape and to make it productive. You will not fool those farmers. It seems to me, as I say, that the time has come to really pass some bill that can pass, one that will not be vetoed.

Well, now, what is that bill? I want to indorse it—I want to go a little further than the bill of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KETCHAM; and I want to indorse in very large part what the master of the grange has said this morning. I do not agree with him about tariffs. I am a low-tariff man. But, be that as it may—he did not state his own view—the bill I have here does not look like the attitude of these farm-relief fellows from Iowa, Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. DICKINSON, who stood in the halls of Congress and wept copious tears over the high tariff running and robbing the farmer. And yet a few days ago, when they had an opportunity to vote for the McMaster resolution to reduce the tariff, they wrapped their snug garments of political fealty about themselves and voted to not have any reduction of the tariff. [Laughter.] They wept and shed tears last year about the misery and the poverty of the farmer, and said it had been caused by high tariffs, and only the other day they voted to confirm him in that misery and consign him to several more years of that misery and that poverty. So, we are not going to get anything through tariff reduction as long as we have this farm-relief crowd from Iowa running the Government. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let us pass something practical; let us pass something that will give real relief. What will do it? I want to commend the bill of my colleague, Mr. JONES, of Texas, which is similar to the Ketcham bill.

I want to say that I was very much pleased this morning to hear the master of the grange pay my colleague, Mr. MARVIN JONES, that splendid compliment that he had shown a grasp of the farm situation that few Members of Congress had shown. I would go still further. I recently had an article in Texas Farm and Ranch, a leading farm magazine of the United States, in which I proposed this sort of a plan, and I think my colleague has the very plan in mind. I proposed the establishment of an export corporation, with a revolving fund of $300,000,000 or $400,000,000, or whatever is necessary, out of the Treasury, on the same plan as the McNary-Haugen bill.

Then I tied into that plan—I would tie into that this export debenture system. So that if the exporter would not pay back to that producer you were talking about, Mr. KINCHELOE, the fellow who did not belong to the cooperative, the fellow with 15 kids and 10 bales of cotton, who has got to sell those 10 bales of cotton and can not hold them; he can not wait; he does not belong to a cooperative; he can not wait until next summer; he has got to sell it now; the corporation would give him a market. I would have this export corporation, with sufficient capital, so that when the price fell below a reasonable figure, based on the cost of production, that that export corporation would get into the market and buy cotton and hold it, and then that export corporation when it exported that cotton could take the export debentures and either import the manufactured goods back on its own account or it could sell them to importers and take the money from the export debentures and put it into this revolving fund as capital account——

Mr. KINCHELOE. You would have those debentures negotiable, would you not?

Mr. CONNALLY. Absolutely negotiable. That plan would bring a raise in price to every farmer, whether a member of the cooperative or not, because that export corporation would afford healthy competition with all other exporters; it would afford a competitive market, and if the exporter bought that cotton or that wheat he would have to pay the price that would move it away from the export corporation itself. Then I would, under the debenture system, allow the exporter and the cooperatives to have the same privilege of getting the debentures that the export corporation would have; and the reason for that is that you would then be setting up competitive agencies there, each one bidding for the farmers' product, and naturally that would stimulate the price and make it go to its highest possible level.

Mr. JONES. Mr. CONNALLY, do you not think it would take an export corporation or something similar to that to take care of this individual farmer?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I way saying. I want the export corporation tied right in here with the debenture system.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is exactly right. I am thinking along the same line.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand Mr. JONES has a bill that provides that in a way.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is giving some new suggestions in connection with it, and I am glad to hear him on it.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is my idea and my plan.

That is workable. Let me show you why: The export debentures, according to the master of the grange here, would probably supplement that revolving fund of $150,000,000 a year, would it not? And every farmer in America would get a reflection of that advance in price. That plan would add $140,000,000 annually to the price of farm products, and on cotton 2 cents per pound, or $10 per bale. It would not be confined to the cooperatives, because it would raise the whole commodity market. The man would not have to wait until next summer to get his returns. That would be the direct result, but the indirect result in stimulating the market would be still greater.

Let us get to one other point. Why did I vote against the McNary-Haugen bill? I voted against the McNary-Haugen bill, gentlemen, just like a great many of you voted against it, because it had that equalization fee in it. The Attorney General of the United States has said that equalization fee is unconstitutional. The law makes the Attorney General the adviser of the President on legal questions; and do you suppose any President, with any self-respect, is going to approve a bill that the Attorney General tells him has got a clause in it that is absolutely unconstitutional? If you think that Mr. Coolidge is that kind of a man, you are simply a Christian Science farm-relief man. You think you are for farm relief, but you are not. [Laughter.] That is all there is to that, if you really think that he is not going to do it, you don't know; and anybody who believes he is believes in ghosts. [Laughter.] He is not going to do it.

So, now, in that situation, what do you want to do?

Mr. RUBY. He says he is going to do that way, anyway.

Mr. CONNALLY. The governor says he is going to do that way. So what are you going to do? Are you going to fool the farmers—are you going down home and make that same speech you made all over your district last year, painting the picture of the farmer in disaster and all that, and say, "We tried to do something"? Oh, yes; "We tried to do something, and the President would not let us do it." You can go down there and make that speech, but you are not fooling all of them.

Mr. ASWELL. Three times.

Mr. FULMER. May I ask you a question, Mr. CONNALLY?

Mr. CONNALLY. You may; yes.

Mr. FULMER. In stimulating the price under your proposition, would you not naturally stimulate production?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would not stimulate production any more than it would stimulate it under the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. FULMER. That is right. Do you have anything in this bill——

Mr. JONES. I will state to the gentleman that there is a provision in both bills here presented for a reduction of these debentures in the event there is an increase in production.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is a clause in both the bills to regulate the debenture certificates in amount. If it stimulates production too much you lower the debentures.

Mr. JONES. And you may take it off altogether?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. That has a tendency to slow it up. Whenever a man makes the statement that he wants to raise the price of the farmers' product and tries to avoid the fact that that is going to stimulate production, of course, he is in error. But what are all these bills trying to do? Raise the price, are they not? That argument that it is to raise the price is going to meet every one of you on every plan you have got, because if you were not trying to raise the farmers' price you would not be up here in this room to-day.

What else about the equalization fee? I say it is unconstitutional, and I voted against it. We tried to get you to limit the bill to $25 per bale on cotton, but you would not do it, and gave the board power to fix it at any figure it might choose.

Gentlemen, that equalization fee is beautiful in theory. The gentleman from South Carolina asked a question there which is splendid, because the theory of the equalization fee is that this omniscient all-powerful, all-wise board is going to know just exactly when the market requires that they pop on the fee so as to reduce production and regulate it. That is a beautiful theory. But, gentlemen, it will not work; it is not workable. To tax each bale of cotton from $10 to $25, and turn the farmer's money over to some one else to spend will not relieve the farmer of anything except his money. You tell me that the farmer who goes up to sell a bale of cotton or who goes up to sell a bushel of wheat—I am not talking about these professional farmers, these book farmers, who draw big salaries to agitate and propagandize. But I am talking about the fellow who raises wheat and corn and cotton. You can not tell me that he favors the equalization fee. I am talking about the man who does not belong to the cooperatives. If he wanted to join the cooperatives, he would join it. But a great many people in this country do not believe in that; they want to run their own business; they want to sell their own stuff in their own way.

I can see that fellow in Texas who has raised only about three bales of cotton. In the fall he takes a bale of it up to the gin and gets it under the sucker and begins to scratch the cotton up the blowpipe. About that time a Government inspector comes out to collect the equalization fee. He says, "Hold on. Don't begin to gin this cotton yet. Have you paid the equalization fee?" The fellow says, "What? What did you say?" "Why, the $10 to $25 equalization fee on this bale of cotton," or $15 or $20. "What is that for?" "That is the new farm relief provided in the farm relief bill." [Laughter.] He says, "What did you say—farm what?" "Farm relief; farm relief bill." "I never joined nothing like that." "No; I know you didn't, but your Congressman joined for you." [Laughter.] "The devil he did." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, you can laugh all you please about that; but that is a fact. That is not workable. It will not work.

What else does it do? The equalization fee would create an army of employees. You can not dodge that. It would create an army of employees and bureaucrats. And who is going to pay for them? Who would pay all these salaries? Gentlemen, it would come out of the farmers; it would come out of the equalization fee. And what are you planning here? You would absolutely consume him with this army of employees and hangers-on and understrappers; and that would come out of the farmer's own pocket, and you know it would. It would come out of the $10 or $25 the farmer would pay on each bale of cotton.

Let me tell you something. The boys who are not members of these cooperatives are not for the McNary-Haugen bill; and let me tell you why they are not for it. They are beginning to find out that under the McNary-Haugen bill every man who sells a bushel of wheat or bale of cotton or any other agricultural commodity under that bill has got to pay the equalization fee, whether he belongs to an organization or not. What goes with that fee? These farmers that run their own business are beginning to learn; these farmers are beginning to find out that their $10, $15, or $20 on a bale of cotton and 25 cents or 50 cents on a bushel of wheat is going to be thrown into a fund, and turned over to whom? Turned over to the cooperatives. That is the truth. They are finding it out. They are going to turn over the money collected from all of the farmers and put it into a fund and turn that fund over to the cooperatives to handle and manage and speculate with and carry their cotton and their wheat, and such other as they choose to buy; and they are not for—they are not for it, and I as a representative of all these farmers who do not belong to the co-ops am not going to vote for a law that makes him—I mean that makes them—join the cooperatives whether they want to or whether they do not. And if he does not do it I am not going to tax him and take his money and turn it over to the cooperatives to exploit and practice on.

One other thing. They say you must not have a subsidy. I submit that under this debenture plan there is no subsidy. It is shown here that the Treasury would not get so much money in tariff duties. It is true. But in the case of aluminum, these farm-relief fellows of Iowa, when they voted to give Andrew Mellon a monopoly on the aluminum business they kept out of the Treasury, according to the department's figures, $300,000. Three hundred thousand dollars would have gone in there if they had not raised the tariff on aluminum, and by the same token took several millions out of the pockets of the farm wives, the city wives, and all other housewives in this country in added cost of the aluminum ware they use. So it is no more a subsidy than the raised tariff on aluminum.

I submit that all this is going to be more or less of an experiment. The whole project of farm relief is going to be an experiment. I think it is worth several hundred millions, even if you do go into the Treasury and take it out, to demonstrate either the success of some of these plans or the failure of some of these plans. They talk about the railroads. When you turned the railroads back to their stockholders, for that six-month period in which they were granted a certain income, where did it come from? It came out of the Treasury of the United States; it did not come out of any equalization fee levied on the railroads themselves, did it? No.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what this bill will do; it will take the money out of the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman voted for the Esch-Cummins law, did he not?

The CHAIRMAN. I did not.

Mr. CONNALLY. You have been asked that you do for the farmer what has been done for the railroads. Under the Esch-Cummins law you did that for the railroads. Now, why is it not fair, according to their own doctrine, to do the same thing for the farmers? Suppose we spend $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 in the experiment and find out we have made a failure; we can quit, can we not? The Treasury is not so badly off that it can not afford it. This is a great industry and it is worth the experiment.

Let me tell you about the equalization fee. This country is supposed to be still a country of free men and free industry. The McNary-Haugen bill with that equalization fee would build up the most autocratic tyranny in an industry that could be conceived of in this country. Here is a fellow who has a farm out here and he goes out and raises a bale of cotton or a bushel of wheat. He raises it with the sinews and the muscles of his own hands, out under God's own sunlight, tilling it with his own implements in his own soil. If when he produces it and comes up to the markets of the world with a bale of cotton in one hand and a bushel of grain in the other, the McNary-Haugen bill says: "You shall not sell it. You shall not exchange the fruits of your toil and the fruits of your soil, brought together there by the mystic elements in nature's laboratory, under God's sun. You shall not sell either one of them until you pay tribute in the form of an equalization fee." What for; to run the Government? Oh, no. To maintain armies in the national defense? Oh, no. To keep the Navy afloat to protect the national honor? Oh, no. What for? To maintain the courts? No. To punish crime? No. Why, to turn it over to some little board selected by a group of particular organizations, representing only 7 or 8 per cent of the entire farmers of the United States. Are we going to say to the farmer that "You shall not sell your product until you pay this tribute to this group and let them dissipate it in their unwisdom, as they may dissipate it"?

Gentlemen, I can not take up all of your time. I do not want to take up much more of your time.

But here is the Grange, as I understand it, the largest and the oldest agricultural organization on the earth, advocating this debenture doctrine. I approve the plan as outlined in my remarks a few minutes ago and substantially that of my distinguished colleague from Texas, Mr. MARVIN JONES, and that is the establishment of an export corporation with sufficient capital or a revolving fund out of the Treasury, to be replenished from time to time by the debenture, and then tied into that system this debenture plan; and it will operate for the benefit of every farmer that produces a bushel of wheat or a bale of cotton anywhere in these United States. And you will not have this great army of employees and fee collectors and inspectors and auditors and officials. You will have a very small organization. It will not cost the Government a dollar, except in the method of this debenture system. And I submit that it is workable; it is a practical system and it really offers some hope of relief. While everybody knows who knows anything that the McNary-Haugen bill as it was in the last session with the equalization fee, even if it passes both Houses, can not pass the White House. And we are mad—we are mad, or else we are insincere and we are mountebanks—we are either mad or mountebanks if we try to bunco the American farmer again with the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee in it, that you know is going to be vetoed the moment it is laid on the President's desk. The man who insists on passing the McNary-Haugen equalization fee when he knows it will be vetoed does not want any farm relief. He is merely trying to fool the farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Something was said about fooling the farmer. Let us examine the two measures before us and see which one fools the farmer. Let us assume that we export wheat to the extent of 200,000,000 bushels, where under the debenture plan it would cost the Government $42,000,000. Under the equalization fee plan, if you advance the price 50 cents, the equalization fee would be 12½ cents, which would leave the farmer 37½ cents net. The farmer would be receiving 37½ cents instead of 21 cents, which is 16½ cents above the debenture plan. Hence a profit to the farmer of 16½ cents a bushel over the debenture plan, or $300,000,000 net, and the cost to the Government under the debenture plan would be $42,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the gentleman was asking me a question.

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to tell the committee which plan has the best values for the farmer.

Mr. CONNALLY. You ask me to tell you, and I am telling you. I want to answer your question.

The CHAIRMAN. Which plan is the better for the farmer? The equalization plan that pays $300,000,000 net, or the debenture plan that pays $168,000,000, with $42,000,000 at the expense of the Treasury; the equalization plan which gives the farmer 37½ cents, or the debenture plan which gives him 21 cents; the equalization plan giving him $300,000,000 net, or the debenture plan giving him $168,000,000, at an expense of $42,000,000 borne by the Treasury? As a result, under the equalization plan the farmer would be ahead $132,000,000 and the Government would be ahead $42,000,000. The farmer and the Federal Treasury would be $174,000,000 ahead.

Mr. CONNALLY. I never have understood what the gentleman's question is. I do not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Turn your attention to the two plans.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know about the two plans.

The CHAIRMAN. Two hundred million bushels of wheat exported would cost the Government $42,000,000——

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to answer a question, but every time I start to answer the gentleman starts again and I can not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. I am going to show you which plan would give the most to the farmer.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman arbitrarily assumes that his bill will do things that can not be proven.

The CHAIRMAN. If you do not want to answer the question, we will take it up later.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer any questions the gentleman may ask. I do not want to be discourteous.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked this question—it is a simple one: Under the debenture plan, if 800,000,000 bushels of wheat are marketed or sold and 200,000,000 bushels exported, the cost to the Government would be $42,000,000. Assuming that the price would advance 21 cents a bushel, the producers would receive from the Government 21 cents a bushel on the 200,000,000 bushels exported—that is $42,000,000; and 21 cents a bushel on the 600,000,000 bushels—that would be $126,000,000, a total of $168,000,000.

Under the equalization plan, if the price is advanced—the tariff of 42 cents and 8-cent cost of bringing to our port of entry, or total of 50 cents—and 200,000,000 bushels are exported, the equalization fee would be 12½ cents, which would leave the farmer 37½ cents net, or 16½ cents above the 21 cents received under the debenture plan; and the producers' net profit would be $300,000,000 or $132,000,000 more than under the debenture plan. In other words, under the debenture plan, the producers would receive $168,000,000, of which $42,000,000 would be at the expense of the Federal Treasury; and under the equalization-fee plan they would receive a net gain of $300,000,000. In other words, the debenture plan not only makes a raid on the Treasury to the extent of $42,000,000, but pays the producers $132,000,000 less than under the equalization plan, where the cost is paid by the producers themselves and no burden placed on the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that your question?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question. Is that fooling the people?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the gentleman that I do not think anybody, unless it be the gentleman from Iowa, believes that the McNary-Haugen bill would raise the price of wheat 50 cents a bushel. In the past the gentleman voted for a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and he told the House at the time it passed that all we had to do to raise the price of wheat 42 cents a bushel was to pass the bill. Now he comes back in the McNary-Haugen bill and says it does not raise the price 42 cents a bushel, and you have to devise some other artificial contrivance to do what he said would be done by the 42 cents a bushel tariff. He may be just as much in error again.

The CHAIRMAN. It has never been declared that it would advance the price 42 cents a bushel, nor has a vote ever been taken to fix the tariff at 42 cents.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is a beautiful theory, but it will not work. It has not worked. Let me ask the question. Does the gentleman believe the President will approve the McNary-Haugen bill?

The CHAIRMAN. I am not so much concerned about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know you are not, but I am. I want the gentleman to answer my question. If you really want farm relief, you ought to be concerned whether it will be vetoed.

The CHAIRMAN. I think every Member should vote as his conscience dictates.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman want a bill or a veto?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think the President would have any respect for me if I should do as he might direct. I have a higher conception of my duty than that; I have a higher regard for Members of Congress than to suggest such a thing. Personally, I would not want it said that I am serving as a bellhop for the President or anybody else.

Mr. CONNALLY. Do you think the President is going to be your bellhop and approve this bill if you pass it?

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 10, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

FRIDAY, February 10, 1928

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 9, 1928)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate Resolution 128.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate commends the observance of this precedent by the President.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if this were a resolution submitting an amendment to the Constitution providing for not more than one or two terms for a President, there might be much urged in favor of it. It does nothing of the kind. It proposes no action by the Senate. It proposes no study or legislation and not even an investigation of any sort. The passage of the resolution, in my judgment, amounts to nothing more than the declaration of 49 or more Senators that in their judgment the people of the country are not competent to select their President.

Mr. President, I can not subscribe to any such doctrine. I shall vote against the resolution and await with interest the vote of Senators whose party slogan a few years ago was "Let the people rule." Nor can I subscribe to the declaration in the resolution that leaving the selection of their President to the American people would be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions." Such a reflection as that upon the American people is wholly unwarranted and unjustified. If there is such danger in trusting the people, let an amendment be submitted to the Constitution restricting or limiting the terms of their Presidents, and give the people the opportunity of deciding as to whether or not they want to limit themselves further as to the selection of their Presidents.

Mr. EDGE and Mr. HARRISON suggested the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ferris	McKellar	Shipstead
Barkley	Fess	McLean	Shortridge
Bingham	Fletcher	McMaster	Simmons
Black	Frazier	McNary	Smith
Blaine	George	Mayfield	Smoot
Blease	Gerry	Metcalf	Steck

Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Deneen	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Dill	Kendrick	Sackett	Willis
Edge	King	Schall
Edwards	La Follette	Sheppard

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate while I discuss, and I hope briefly, a resolution which I venture to suggest has no place in this body. I apologize, therefore, for taking up the time of the Senate upon a subject such as this; but perhaps I will be pardoned in view of the example which has been set.

Mr. President, I keep uppermost in my mind the Constitution of our country. That Constitution was framed by wisdom and ratified by a patriotic people. Under that Constitution we have grown from weakness unto strength, from a Nation of three and one-half millions of people to a mighty Republic of over 110,000,000, from a little Nation to one of the greatest and the most prosperous on the earth.

Naturally the pending resolution has brought to our attention the father of our country. All the resources of lofty and loving eloquence have been exhausted in vain attempts to portray the greatness and the genius for war and government of Washington. Orators, poets, historical writers, philosophers on government, each in his turn has paid tribute to the father of our country. The character of Washington, his words, his thoughts, his example have properly and naturally been brought to our attention, and before I shall have finished I hope to quote the very words of Washington in respect to the very matter embraced within the resolution before us.

I digress to say aside that I have been somewhat surprised that Senators have not consulted the writings of Washington; not what has been said of him in eulogy, but what he, the wise man, the patriotic man, the great man, said in respect of this very proposition, namely, the eligibility or ineligibility of the occupant of the presidential office. I now say at the very outset that if we read what he wrote we shall see that George Washington saw no danger to the Republic in leaving it to the wisdom and the patriotism of the people of America to choose their President.

I say with respect, as I remarked in passing a moment ago, that a resolution of this sort has no place in the Senate. This is a legislative body. The Constitution very wisely divides our Government into three great departments—the legislative, with certain delegated power; the executive, with well-defined power; and the judicial, with power to interpret, to construe the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and laws enacted by the different States to determine whether those laws run counter to the supreme law of the Constitution or laws made in pursuance thereof.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator has said that the Senate is a legislative body. Has he forgotten that it recently considered itself to be judicial?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I had. I should add that while it is a legislative body, its functions may be divided into three parts: First, legislative power proper; second, advisory power in the matter of treaties and certain Federal offices; and, third, judicial power when it comes to sit as a court or a body of impeachment. So the purpose and essence of this resolution can not fall within any one of these three functions which the Senate specifically has under the Constitution.

Ah, it may be said that this is a mere idle remark; but, Mr. President, if this resolution is proper to be entertained, proper to be discussed, taking the time of the Senate for hours and days, then it is quite easy to suggest that there are many other resolutions that might well, with equal propriety, be introduced and disposed of. This resolution might well be debated by members of some kindergarten school in some remote village; but the Senate of the United States is not the place for its consideration. However, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], seeing the pillars of the Republic trembling and the "wide arch of the ranged empire" collapsing, and fearing that Plymouth Rock may be taken up and thrown into the sea, introduces this moth-eaten resolution.

It has afforded a coveted opportunity for Senators to display knowledge of a few scraps of history; and it has enabled some Senators to unleash their tongues, rush to the door of the temple of liberty, and beat back the enemies of the Republic—as though to-day, in this year of our Lord 1928, an enemy was at our gate, that Hannibal was within sight of Rome.

Since I see my scholarly friend from Utah [Mr. KING] smiling, for his mind goes back over the past and he knows something of the history of the world, I wonder what would have been said in the Roman Senate when Hannibal was within a few miles from Rome, out there on the Appian Way, if some senator in his toga had risen and introduced a resolution that no general of the Roman Army should be appointed or reelected a third time—if it had been suggested that Fabius be dismissed! As Senators familiar with history know, if a Roman senator had made such a proposition in the Roman Senate he would have been hurled from the Tarpeian Rock; he would have been regarded as another Catiline.

Mr. President, what is the meaning of this resolution?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. NEELY. I hope that the scholarly and eloquent statesman from California does not mean to intimate that Senators will, by supporting the La Follette resolution, become as infamous as Catiline, who murdered his brother-in-law and conspired to overthrow the government of his country.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; but I am prompted to say that it seems to me that any Senator who votes for this immediate resolution is afraid of the people of the United States of America, or, perhaps, thinks that we have sunk to that depth of political depravity suggested by Washington in his letter to Lafayette when we may not rely upon the people of the Republic.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The plain inference from the Senator's remarks is that he favors a third term for the Chief Executive?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not at all. I will make myself plain; it will not be necessary to draw an inference. I generally attempt to make myself clearly understood.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the Senator has stated that it is almost treasonable for other Senators to support a resolution declaring against a third term for the Chief Executive. What other inference could one draw from his remarks?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. You may draw this inference, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, that any Senator to-day who feels it necessary to warn against a third term for the President must have reached the conclusion referred to by Washington, that he fears the people have become so debauched, so lost to political virtue, so cooled off in their reverence for the Constitution and the laws, that we may not trust them. I do not occupy that position, and I do not think the Senator from Arkansas does; I am sure he does not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator inform the Senate whether he favors a third term for the Chief Executive?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can imagine conditions, such as Washington points out, when it would be the patriotic duty of the Nation or of the people of the United States to continue in their service a chosen Chief Executive, the Commander in Chief of their Army and Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, if I understand the Senator, my first inference was correct, namely, if the Senator thinks the country has a good President that President is justified in seeking a third term or the people are justified in supporting him for a third term.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator, of course, will utterly fail in attempting to state my position wrongly; he does not do it intentionally; but I say this: I am going to leave this matter with the people of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We shall all do that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course we shall.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We shall all do that if any President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let us do it, then.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If any President chooses to violate the precedent about which we are speaking; but I do not feel that there is anything treasonable or cowardly in a Senator expressing his adherence to what has become the accepted policy of the Nation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will discuss that, but I am not imputing treason. I am saying—and I shall not longer be diverted—that I am willing to trust the people; and I do not think they are calling upon the Senator from Arkansas or upon me or upon other Senators here to legislate for them or to pass any such resolution. I have faith in the people of the United States. I believe the people of the Senator's great State and of my State love the Constitution to-day better and have greater faith in our form of government than they ever had before. And therefore——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the Senator——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me. Therefore—and I repeat myself over and over again—this seems to me to be an untimely resolution; it is an unwise resolution; nor is it true, so far as treason is concerned, that it would be unpatriotic for the people of America in a great emergency to continue in service a President who had carried the Nation on, even if it be so for two elected terms.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Washington had done that, had he not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, he had.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And Washington decried against a third term.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He did not, Senator—pardon the emphasis. Washington never uttered one word against it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator think the example of Washington tends to support the policy of third terms for Presidents?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The example of Washington is known to the world.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will answer now—it is out of the order of my thought, but perhaps it is just as well to pause right here.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me; I will yield presently. Let me first courteously reply to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. NEELY. I wish only to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, what thought is bursting out? What is it?

Mr. NEELY. Is the Senator's belief coextensive with his implication that all Senators who support the La Follette resolution should be hurled from the Tarpeian Rock to political oblivion?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I hope the Senator from West Virginia will live in a Lucullan banquet room the rest of his life. But I wish to say here that I may move an amendment to this resolution providing that no Senator with a six-year term shall ever be elected for a third term. That is fraught with great danger. The power that is developed in the Senate——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, would it not greatly distress the Senator from California if the Senate should adopt his suggested amendment?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No. I am entering upon my second term, and I will trust to the whirligig of politics.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is one thought that occurs to me in view of the Senator's argument that the resolution has no proper place in the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It has not.

Mr. PITTMAN. The thought occurs to me that the resolution is necessary in defense of the candidates for the Presidency on the Republican side of the Senate. Does not the Senator believe that the only possible excuse for Republican Senators being candidates for the Presidency is the fact that they believe President Coolidge meant what he said?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My reply to my learned friend from the far West——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Not so far west.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My reply is that I am not speaking of persons to-day, unless it be the great George Washington. I am not thinking of the present occupant of the White House; I am not thinking of any man; I am thinking of our form of government and the power of the people of this Republic to choose their officers, including their President. I am not thinking of any particular Democratic or Republican candidate for that high office, though they are as—

> Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks in Vallombrosa.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator is making a serious argument, and I think it is a serious question which is involved.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is.

Mr. PITTMAN. But I do think it is unkind, not to say cruel, that the Senator should say to all the other Senators here, if there are any who are not candidates, that they shall be debarred from supporting the position taken by the candidates who are members of this body. I think that any Senator here has an absolute right to be a candidate for the Presidency, and I think that his sincerity should not be questioned, and when we have Republican Senators daily announcing their candidacy we can not allow it to be considered by the country that their action is treasonable to their President. I think we should state as a Senate that we believe that the candidates who are now members of the Senate firmly believe that the President of the United States was sincere when he said he was not going to run.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, many are called but few are chosen. [Laughter.] I grant that every distinguished, learned, scholarly, and ambitious Member of the Senate has a constitutional right to run for the Presidency and may be eligible intellectually and otherwise. I am offering no bar to any Senator here who may desire to run for the office.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know; but I do not think the Senator meant to reflect upon the Senators who are candidates.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not want that idea to get out, when the Senator said that he was not thinking about the senatorial candidates. There are a great many people who are thinking of the senatorial candidates. It is possible that some of them will be nominated. As a matter of fact, there is no reason why some of them should not be nominated, in my opinion. As a matter of fact, there are none of them but that I should like to see nominated.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, time is running on and we have not eternity at our disposal.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator's quotation of one of Milton's classical and mellifluous expressions reminds me of a stanza of Byron's Destruction of Sennacherib, which is as follows:

> Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
> That host with their banners at sunset were seen;
> Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
> That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown!

Does the Senator from California realize that all but one of the Republican candidates for the presidential nomination will inevitably be overtaken by a fate similar to that which overwhelmed the Assyrian host?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is very beautiful; but the word "green" suggests to me this: I have a little touch of Irish in me, and I do not care what color you paint your barns down in West Virginia, provided it is green.

Mr. NEELY. Unless there is a change of administration, we shall not even be able to whitewash them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, it will be a Republican Senator that will come back from West Virginia next time. Pardon me for saying that.

Mr. NEELY. In which improbable event the people of West Virginia would suffer a dire calamity.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Now, returning to my friend from Arkansas, let me quote what Washington said upon this immediate point of ineligibility to the presidential office, if that be a proper way to express it.

In a letter addressed to Lafayette in 1789 among other things he said what I shall read in a moment. May I pause to say Washington was discussing, in correspondence with Lafayette, our Constitution. Of course, we know the great love that existed between Lafayette and Washington—one of those beautiful affections, sexless love, ennobling love of man for man. He opened his heart to Lafayette—I hope that is a good phrase to use—and he said:

> On the general merits of this proposed Constitution, I wrote to you some time ago my sentiments pretty freely. * * * There are other points in which opinions would be more likely to vary. As for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President, after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is, in respect to the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you, as to the necessity or expediency of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the convention—

Senators remember all that discussion, and it is not necessary to take up the time here to go back and quote from the debates in the Constitutional Convention. Washington sat there presiding; he listened to all those arguments, and he said:

> The matter was fairly discussed in the convention, and to my full conviction, though I can not have time or room to sum up the argument in this letter, there can not, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then, there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though, when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves, and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes. Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man, who in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

I hope that the heralds of the morning, or of the dusky evening, will quote that and let the people of the United States know, not what we say of George Washington, not what we think of him, but let the people know what George Washington said in his letter to Marquis de Lafayette in 1789. I have read it, and I hope it will be reread and pondered.

But, moreover, that is not the only time when George Washington spoke specifically on this very question of ineligibility, or the limiting of the term for a given man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, we all know that there is no inhibition in the Constitution against a President who has served two terms succeeding himself. Is it the purpose of the Senator now to attempt to show that George Washington favored third terms for President, and is it his purpose to show that it is sound public policy?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not setting out to show that, Mr. President. I am setting out now to show, as I said, that George Washington never expressed himself in hostility to a third term if there was a great emergency which called for a given man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Nevertheless, Mr. President, when urged to become a candidate for a third term, when the Nation seemed to demand his services, when many great influences were being brought to bear upon him to make the sacrifice, he declined to do so, and his action in declining under those conditions forms the basis of a policy which has become well established in the conscience and judgment of the great majority of the American people, in my opinion, namely, that no Chief Executive should succeed himself after having served a second term. There is this consideration, too, which applies with some force to a second term, but not with equal force, namely, that a President who desires to do so can force his own renomination, for the simple reason that in nearly every convention that assembles a large number of the delegates consist of Federal officeholders, and a larger number, perhaps, consist of the relatives and friends of Federal officeholders; and within the last few years we have seen an illustration of a President seeking to be nominated for a second term, whose nomination was encompassed, when he was able to carry only two very small States. So that there is a power and an influence which accrues to one in a high office, particularly a high executive office, which enables that individual, if he chooses to exercise his power, to encompass his own preferment in spite of the will of the public.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; and then the people have the final say; and I am standing with the people to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just to-day? Is that the only time the Senator proposes to stand by the people?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To-day, and all my life; and I claim the right of Arkansas to elect her Senators, too, notwithstanding the vote of this body.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a gratuitous contention. I did not know that anybody had contradicted it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Democratic Party in Baltimore, in convention assembled—the great, historic Democratic Party, representing 48 States, good men and patriotic men, who loved their country—adopted solemnly a platform one plank of which was against a second term. I shall read it here in a moment. They nominated a great American. He kept us out of war; but when 1916 came along, forgetting their platform, they renominated him; and the people of America elected him. I do not cite that as indicating inconsistency or abandonment of principle. If I cite it for any immediate purpose, it is to show that finally the choice of a President rests with the people of America.

Now, let me quote again what Washington said:

> There can not in my judgment be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity.

Mr. President, I am not willing to admit, this day or any other day, that the American people have reached that depth of moral or political depravity. I believe that the people of this country—men and women—are devoted to the Constitution and will exercise a wise and discriminating judgment in the choice of a President.

Moreover, right on this point, in a letter to Bushrod Washington, dated November 10, 1786, Washington said—and he speaks so much better than I can that I read his words—touching the safeguards in the Constitution against the perpetuation of power in one man or in a group of men:

The power under the Constitution will always be in the people. It is intrusted for certain defined purposes and for a certain limited period to representatives of their own choosing, and whenever it is executed contrary to their interest or not agreeable to their wishes their servants can and undoubtedly will be recalled. It is agreed on all hands that no government can be well administered without powers; yet the instant these are delegated, although those who are intrusted with the administration are no more than the creatures of the people, act as it were but for a day, and are amenable for every false step they take, they are, from the moment they receive it, set down as tyrants; their natures, they would conceive from this, immediately changed, and that they can have no other disposition but to oppress. Of these things, in a Government constituted and guarded as ours is, I have no idea, and do firmly believe, that, whilst many ostensible reasons are assigned to prevent the adoption of it, the real ones are concealed behind the curtains, because they are not of a nature to appear in open day. I believe, further, supposing them fewer, that as great evils result from too great jealousy as from the want of it. We need look, I think, no further for proof of this than to the constitution of some, if not all, of these States. No man is a warmer advocate for proper restraints and wholesome checks in every department of government than I am, but I have never yet been able to discover the propriety of placing it absolutely out of the power of men to render essential services, because a possibility remains of their doing ill.

A little later, in a letter written in 1788 to Lafayette, when the country was discussing the amending of the Articles of Confederation, Washington said, in assigning his reasons for the support of a constitution such as framed:

These powers—as the appointment of all rulers will forever arise from, and at short-stated intervals recur to, the free suffrage of the people—are so distributed among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, into which the General Government is arranged, that it can never be in danger of degenerating into a monarchy, an oligarchy, an aristocracy, or any other despotic or oppressive form, so long as there shall remain any virtue in the body of the people.

So I set out to say—and I did say—that there is no known writing of Washington wherein he expresses the thought that there should be a limit as to the election or reelection of a President any more than that there should be a limit as to the election or reelection of a Senator or of a Member of the House or as to the election or reelection of a governor of one of our great and quasi-sovereign States.

His example we know, and we know the words of Jefferson, but I have here quoted the very words of Washington, in which he says that he wholly disagrees from Jefferson upon that proposition. As he repeatedly stated, Washington was willing to leave the subject matter of the choice of a President to the people of the Republic, and I shall be surprised if any industrious, scholarly Senator will be able to find any word in Washington's formal documents, in his letters, in his private diary, in which he expressed a thought different from what he said to Lafayette in 1789.

One word more on this remote historical period. We know that Washington did not wish to become President the first term; we know that. After presiding over the convention in Philadelphia, and then going forth with John Marshall and others and urging the adoption of the Constitution, he retired to Mount Vernon, in the hope that there he would enjoy the pleasures and the satisfaction of private life. I have his words here in respect to being called back into the public service for the first term, and after reading them, I will take the liberty of quoting from him as to what he said as to a third term, in a reply to Lafayette.

In 1789 George Washington said this, after the adoption of the Constitution by the several States:

The choice of Senators, Representatives, and electors, which (excepting in that of the last description) took place at different times in the different States, has afforded abundant topics for domestic news since the beginning of autumn. * * * I will content myself with only saying that the elections have been hitherto vastly more favorable than we could have expected, that Federal sentiments seem to be growing with uncommon rapidity, and that this increasing unanimity is not less indicative of the good disposition than the good sense of the Americans. Did it not savor so much of partiality for my countrymen, I might add that I can not help flattering myself that the new Congress, on account of the self-created respectability and various talents of its Members, will not be inferior to any assembly in the world. I most heartily wish the choice—

I beg Senators to listen to this, for I hope to impress them with it—

I most heartily wish the choice to which you allude [election to the Presidency] may not fall on me. * * * If I should conceive myself in a manner constrained to accept, I call Heaven to witness that this very act would be the greatest sacrifice of my personal feelings and wishes that I ever have been called upon to make.

My movements to the chair of government will be accompanied by feelings not unlike those of a culprit who is going to the place of his execution. * * * Integrity and firmness are all I can promise. These, be the voyage long or short, shall never forsake me, although I may be deserted by all men; for, of the consolations which are to be derived from these, under any circumstances, the world can not deprive me.

Heaven knows that no event [election to the Presidency] can be less desired by me, and that no earthly consideration short of so general call, together with a desire to reconcile contending parties as far as in me lies, could again bring me into public life.

We know why he did not yield to the importunities of men to be elected after his second term. Later, in 1799, during the administration of John Adams, when there had grown up the Federalist and the Anti-Federalist Parties, and John Adams betrayed little ability to carry on successfully, if you please, there was then a movement, in 1799, about the close of this intervening term of Adams, to call Washington back into the Presidency for a third term, even as a great mass of Americans wanted to call Theodore Roosevelt back after an intervening term. We have here the words of Washington in regard to that matter, as to why he did not accept the call, and those of us familiar with that period well might blush when we recall the bitter, the ungenerous attacks that were made upon Washington. Indeed, it is said that if the smallpox had not broken out in Philadelphia during that period he could not have walked the streets without open insult. Yet we to-day bow in reverence before him and go down as pilgrims to Mount Vernon.

I repeat that in 1799, when John Adams's term was drawing to a close and the great Thomas Jefferson was, of course, fighting him and his party, overtures were made to Washington to become a candidate. He declined, but not because of any third-term prejudice; not at all. He declined because, he said—and his words are here—he could not serve better than the occupant of the office, that partisanship had so developed that he would be abused and traduced even as the occupant of the office was being abused and traduced, and that he could not bring himself to believe that he could serve any more capably. That he said in 1799. I read from his letter to Gov. Jonathan Trumbull, dated July 21, 1799:

I come now, my dear sir, to pay particular attention to that part of your letter which respects myself—

That is, as to his running for a third term in 1799. He continues:

I remember well the conversation which you allude to, and have not forgot the answer I gave you. In my judgment it applies with as much force now as then; nay, more, because at that time the line between parties was not so clearly drawn and the views of the opposition so clearly developed as they are at present. Of course, allowing your observation (as it respects myself) to be founded, personal influence would be of no avail.

Let that party—

Now, I quote him without comment, but this is what Washington said. By "that party," of course Senators know to whom he referred—

Let that party set up a broomstick and call it a true son of liberty—a Democrat—or give it any other epithet that will suit their purpose, and it will command their votes in toto.

Will not the Federalists meet, or rather defend their cause, on the opposite ground? Surely they must, or they will discover a want of policy indicative of weakness and pregnant of mischief, which can not be admitted. Wherein, then, would lie the difference between the present gentleman in office and myself? * * *

It would be criminal, therefore, in me, although it would be the wish of my countrymen, and I could be elected, to accept an office under this conviction which another would discharge with more ability; and this, too, at a time when I am thoroughly convinced that I should not draw a single vote from the Anti-Federal side, and, of course, should stand upon no other ground than any other Federal character well supported; and, when I should become a mark for the shafts of envenomed malice and the basest calumny to fire at—when I should be charged not only with irresolution, but with concealed ambition, which waits only an occasion to blaze out—and, in short, with dotage and imbecility.

So I turn from the Father of his Country by saving that there is not one word in his writings or in his political philosophy against the ineligibility of a citizen of the Republic who meets the requirements of the Constitution to the Presidency.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, again I say there is no question of legal eligibility arising under the resolution; but I do not see how the Senator can quote the language last quoted from Washington in support of the policy of a third term for President.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I respectfully inquire of the Senate what is meant by "second term" in the resolution, or "third term" in the resolution? Does it mean successive terms—two, three successive terms? What is the meaning of "term"? I listened yesterday with respect to some thoughts as to what the word "term" means in the Constitution or what meaning was to be attributed to it in the resolution. "Term?" The Constitution fixes the term. When we speak of the term of a Senator it is six years. When we speak of the term of a President it is four years.

When a President dies—thank God none has ever been impeached—and there is a vacancy the Vice President, by force of the Constitution, performs the functions of the President. He continues the term, the remaining years or months of the fixed constitutional legal term of four years. He does not serve a term. Speaking as a lawyer, if I may presume to do so, he does not serve a term. There is but one term of four years. The President dies. The Vice President continues to perform his functions during the remainder of that time, but the Vice President, I have sometimes thought, does not become President. In such event, I have sometimes thought that the Vice President performs the duties of the President, even as the vice president of a company performs the duties of the president in the latter's absence.

But whatever the Constitution may say on that subject, or whatever the true interpretation of it may be, I stand here contending that the Vice President does not serve a term, but a part of a term remaining unfilled by the President. I therefore question the resolution unless it is made specific as to meaning successive terms.

That brings me to this thought thrown out a moment ago: In 1900 William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt were elected President and Vice President. I take pride in recalling that I bore the returns from California to this body, having been presidential elector at large in that State in 1900. In the providence of God a great catastrophe came upon us in the death of William McKinley. Theodore Roosevelt became President. He served his country well, unafraid, undaunted, never afraid of enemy within or from without. He was a great American. Later he retired with honor from the presidential chair. Four years intervened. There were many millions of American citizens, north and south, east and west, who prayed and worked for the return of Roosevelt to the presidential chair. He failed of nomination and of election, and another great American, in the person of President Wilson, was elected in 1912 and reelected in 1916. But there were millions of people in America who wanted to see Roosevelt again President.

I would like to inquire of Senators, if Theodore Roosevelt had received the nomination and had been elected in 1912 or in 1916 or in 1920, would they have thought the Republic was in danger, and would these same gentlemen who followed his banner have stood here in the Senate or elsewhere opposing him and advancing the argument that he was endangering the Republic or violating some sacred tradition of the Republic?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator, of course, in the campaign of 1912 took a very prominent part in his State, as he has done in the last quarter of a century or more. Did not the Senator in 1912 make speeches throughout California in behalf of Mr. Taft and against the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt on the theory that Mr. Roosevelt had already served two terms?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No. I opposed him then because I then was, always have been, and am a regular Republican.

Mr. HARRISON. And did not the Senator employ the argument which I have just called to his attention?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not some of the speeches of the Senator in that campaign fairly scintillate with the idea that Mr. Roosevelt would be serving longer than Washington, Madison, and those other gentlemen, and therefore he should not be reelected?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not know what the newspapers may have said, but I know my firm views all my life.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator deny that the papers of that time made such statements?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not know what they stated. I deny that any such statement was made unless it is brought to my attention. In that campaign there were three candidates—Woodrow Wilson, former President Roosevelt, and our regularly nominated candidate, William H. Taft. I supported President Taft upon the ground that he was the regularly nominated candidate of the Republican Party and worthy of election, and did not advance those arguments at all. I do not recall ever having discussed the third-term proposition. It may have been mentioned by others, but so far as political discussion was concerned I did not ground my opposition to Mr. Roosevelt at all upon that proposition.

I content myself with asking the question whether as of this day there is any danger confronting the public which would make it necessary for the Senate to indulge in this debate or in this discussion or in considering this resolution? Of course, I am subject to censure in doing so, I admit that; but the example having been set I have thought I would be excused for prolonging the discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has taken up a great deal of time this morning in an effort to inform the country with reference to the views of Washington with regard to a third term for somebody else beside himself. Would the Senator, if he has the information before him, give the country the benefit of the reasons assigned by Mr. Roosevelt for his refusal to become a candidate for a third term? I think if the Senator would investigate that matter, if he has not already done so, he might find some enlightenment. If he has, I think it would be enlightening to the country to know what were the reasons of Mr. Roosevelt for declining to be a candidate to succeed himself after he had held the office, not for two whole terms, but for one whole term and a part of the term of his predecessor.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We ought not to be in doubt for the reasons President Roosevelt assigned, because he expressed them himself. He doubtless entertained those views at that time, but manifestly he did not hold to the view that after an intervening term he would be ineligible, or that to accept then the nomination and election would place him in the position of violating any tradition or imperiling the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a very different question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am discussing this question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; we are discussing the question of a third consecutive term, and not the question of whether a man who has held one term or two terms and then had somebody else as an intervening occupant of the Presidency can properly offer himself for reelection for another term.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A very learned Senator yesterday took that position, that it would be violative of the tradition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not taking any position about it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; it was not the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I am trying to get the Senator to do is to give us the reasons assigned by Mr. Roosevelt himself——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not quote him.

Mr. SIMMONS. The reasons why he did not run for a third term under conditions exactly similar to the conditions which obtain in the case of Mr. Coolidge.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not discussing Mr. Coolidge or Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Anybody. I am discussing the question of the constitutional right of the people of the United States to exercise their choice and their judgment. President Roosevelt expressed himself as of a certain time, giving his reasons. I can not quote his exact words.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator does not get the point of my question. The point of my question is that the Senator has taken up certainly half an hour, if not three-quarters of an hour, explaining why Washington was not a candidate for a third time, or explaining the reasons that Washington gave why somebody else might not be eligible to a third term. Is it not just as pertinent to give the reasons assigned by Mr. Roosevelt, who lived more than 100 years after Washington and when conditions were entirely different in the country? Why not give the reasons assigned by him why he did not run for a third term? That is the question I am putting to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have yielded for the Senator to state his question. The Senator knows that Mr. Roosevelt gave his reason. He advanced the suggestion that it would not be good policy, expressing himself in his own vigorous way. That is all he said. That was the sum and substance of it. He was not a candidate and undoubtedly assisted in the nomination of Mr. Taft.

Mr. SIMMONS. What construction does the Senator place upon the meaning of Mr. Roosevelt's words when he said it would not be good policy—that it would not be wise or patriotic?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He did not say it would be unpatriotic.

Mr. SIMMONS. That it would infringe upon a well-established principle?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He may have said that.

Mr. SIMMONS. What did he mean when he said it would not be good policy?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, he meant what he said. It was not ambiguous or unintelligible.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the Senator's construction of what he meant? Did he mean that it would be unwise; that it would be violative of a well-established precedent that ought to be followed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Unquestionably he said that. There is nothing uncertain about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He gave his reasons for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know he did.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly he did.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wanted the Senator from California to be as specific in speaking about the views of a great American, as he has described Mr. Roosevelt, who had been for two terms in the White House——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He had not been in the White House for two terms.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just like Mr. Coolidge, he had served a part of one term and one full term in the White House; and he thought that it would not be wise, that it would not be in conformity with good public policy for him to allow himself to be nominated for a third term.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Unquestionably he said that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Now, will the Senator from California pardon me a little further?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator first pardon me? The Senator rather censured me for the time I have been taking up. Now, who has consumed most of my time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean to censure the Senator for the time he was taking up; I was not opposed to his taking a reasonable time to elaborate and discuss the case of Roosevelt as he had taken to discuss the case of Washington.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have discussed the case of Washington because history has been misstated; I have discussed that case for a perfectly manifest purpose. I have no hesitation in incorporating in the RECORD here the very words of Roosevelt. I respect them; they are entitled to respectful pondering. The Senator from North Carolina may do so in my time if he wishes.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator had passed the discussion of Roosevelt without mentioning the fact that he declined to be a candidate for a third term under conditions similar to those which now confront Mr. Coolidge.

Then I wish to ask the Senator another question. The Senator has elaborated upon the views of General Washington; he has read from his letters; he has insisted that Washington said there was no danger in a third term or in giving the President an indefinite lease of power. Does the Senator know that long since General Washington departed the great State from which he came, the State of Virginia, saw fit in its constitution to provide that its governor should not hold office for more than one term of four years?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not think that is wise at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know that many other States of this Union, my own State of North Carolina being one of them, the State of South Carolina on one side of us being one of them, the State of Virginia on the other side being one of them, have each of them in their constitutions adopted in recent years provided that their governors shall not hold two consecutive terms?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I know that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why? Because they feared the very thing that is in the public mind when opposition is expressed to a third term for a President of the United States at this time.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With great respect for Virginia and for the Senator's own great State of North Carolina, where my grandfather was born, I do not think it wise for the people of a great State thus to limit themselves. I remember that old Virginia elected and reelected and reelected Patrick Henry to a third term as Governor of Virginia. Did anybody think that the liberties of Virginia were imperiled when that great man was its governor for a third term? The only time, by the way, that Virginia ever turned against Patrick Henry was in the convention at Richmond when the great influence of Washington, Marshall, and others, by a naked majority of only 10 votes, secured the ratification of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, at that time, if I recall aright, the term of the Governor of Virginia was one year, or perhaps two years.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may be.

Mr. SWANSON. Afterwards, however, when the term was extended to four years, making it equal to the presidential term, the patriots of Virginia thought there ought to be a limitation on it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It may be wise for them; I do not know.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask the Senator another question. I recall during the last Roosevelt campaign that charges were made against him that in running again for the presidential office he had violated the doctrine against third termism he laid down on the night of his election. The newspapers were very voluble, as were many citizens, in criticism of him for running again. Did the Senator from California indulge in any such criticism of Roosevelt at that time, that in again running for the Presidency he had departed from the tradition to which he had announced his adherence the night after his election?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not recall having done so, but it is conceivable that I pointed out his inconsistency, he having announced that he was opposed to the third-term idea, as the Senator has done again and again. I may have pointed out——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me for a moment and then I will yield further. I may have pointed out that he was violating his own public declarations, even as I pointed out that the Democratic candidate and the Democratic Party had violated the solemn declaration of the Democratic platform committing the party to the one-term idea when they sought to reelect President Wilson.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him another question. If I understand the discussion at that time, most Republican speakers whom I heard and debated with commended Roosevelt very highly for the letter written the night after his election upholding the tradition against third termism. Subsequently they criticized him severely for departing from it. Did the Senator indulge in any laudation of Roosevelt for having announced that doctrine and then did the Senator follow it up with criticism of Roosevelt for having departed from it, as most of the Republican speakers did at that time?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I never indulged in any such somersault upon that proposition.

Mr. SWANSON. The somersault is being turned now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The somersault is not being turned by me.

Mr. SWANSON. The somersault has occurred about 20 years afterwards.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No. I know my own views, and while they may suffer change, nevertheless I hold fast to one proposition and take my stand with George Washington. If George Washington was wrong, then I am wrong. George Washington saw no danger in entrusting this matter to the people, and he said that if the people became debauched, lost in moral or political virtue, then it mattered little whence the master came, but he feared no man on horseback. While it is in my mind, let me remind Senators who inherit the doctrines of Jefferson—and some of them I inherit—that Thomas Jefferson said that the American people would have their hearts torn out of their breasts rather than surrender their liberty to a Napoleon or a Cæsar. I am not afraid of any Napoleon; I am not afraid of any Cæsar; I see no danger to the Republic from such a quarter; indeed I see no great danger to the Republic from within or from without. I have wasted the time of the Senate and my own to-day more than I should have done in discussing a danger which I think is purely an imaginary one. It is the eye of childhood that fears a painted devil. There is no danger to the Republic which the passage of this resolution will avert. I repeat again and again that I am not thinking of persons nor of the present administration—not at all. I would say the same thing if a Democrat were in the White House, even if he had served a part of a term and was serving his so-called second term. I am not speaking of persons, but of the form of government under which we have operated, and I deny that this resolution speaks the truth when it says that anyone who shall take a contrary view is unpatriotic. Yet if Senators will consider the language of the resolution, they will realize that it imputes lack of patriotism to those who shall vote against it.

I made no charge of treason against anyone. Individual Senators may vote as they think proper, but I wish to divorce the question from all local partisanship or present political considerations. I wish to leave the matter of the election of their President to the American people, to the people of the 48 States. I wish to leave the people free, as the years may come and go in the future, to act as they shall think wise, to do exactly as George Washington said they might well do in some moment of great danger, some occasion of great exigency which would move them to continue in office their Chief Executive.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think there exists in this country a very strong and deep feeling upon the part of all patriotic citizens that it would not be a wise plan for any President to serve for a longer period of time than that served by the first President, George Washington?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Doubtless there are many who so think.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think, instead of there being many, that it is the underlying view of the people of America that General Washington, our great patriot President, and the first one, having voluntarily fixed two terms as proper for him, no other President should serve for a longer time?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may well be.

Finally, Mr. President, this resolution is to the effect that to depart from this alleged tradition is "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril" to the Republic. I deny that. There is not a fact in history which warrants any such conclusion. Responding to the thought of the Senator from Tennessee, if it be desirable that the President shall be limited to two terms of four years, then let us submit an amendment to the Constitution and let the people of the United States pass upon that question. Such an amendment can be submitted to the legislatures of the different States or to conventions called in the several States; and let us propose such an amendment and provide that it shall be considered, ratified, or rejected by conventions called in each and all of the 48 States; and then we can ascertain whether the people of the United States want to bind themselves by such an amendment.

Therefore, I think it would be wise to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that committee, perhaps sympathizing with the purpose of the resolution, might suggest and report a proposed amendment to the Constitution. If such a proposal came before this body, then, of course, it would be the legitimate subject of earnest consideration, for it would have to be passed by the requisite two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House to be submitted for ratification by the people, the legislatures, or conventions. But this resolution will not be a law, and, I repeat, it does not speak the truth.

I am not standing here beating my breast and claiming to be more patriotic than other Senators; but I have a reverent affection for our Constitution and our form of Government. I know what it has done for man and for woman, and I want it to live forever; and if it be desired that we of this generation shall amend it in the way suggested, be it so. The convention that met at Philadelphia discussed it—men who loved liberty, who had shed their blood for liberty discussed this question. Washington sat in the chair corresponding to the one now occupied by our Presiding Officer, listened to those arguments, and the wise men decided not to limit or bind the people of the United States in respect to this matter. If it be desired or be thought wise to depart from the conclusion reached by the fathers, let the people decide, and let them decide that grave matter in an authoritative way; and that way I have suggested. I have not lost faith in the people. Therefore I hope that Senators will agree to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the view, if it be so, of submitting a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I have broken my promise, Mr. President. I have detained the Senate too long. I have in no degree done any justice to the subject, and none to myself; but I leave the matter, trusting there will not linger in the mind of anyone a feeling or a thought that there is anything personal in anything I have said—nothing at all. In political campaigns we inveigh against our so-called political enemies, and doubtless I called attention to the 1912 one-term plank in the platform of the Democratic Party and commented upon their inconsistency. Doubtless I did. It may well be that I commented on the inconsistency of Theodore Roosevelt in doing that which he had spoken against. It may well be. I am not thinking of persons. I am thinking of great principles of government; and I am standing here, very humbly, affording him no strength, beside the father of our country, who was willing to leave this matter to the wise judgment of his countrymen. There I am willing to leave it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the time of the Senate for a considerable portion of the last three or four days has been consumed in what appeals to me as purely a political gesture. I wish to assure the Senate that, following my usual custom, my remarks on the pending resolution will be very, very brief. I think I can assemble in a three-minute talk sufficient objection, at least so far as my viewpoint and conviction are concerned, to demonstrate that this resolution should not be agreed to.

Sponsors for the pending resolution frankly admit that it was introduced for the purpose of deterring the present President of the United States from being called to head his party for the second time, or, as they prefer to put it, to prevent him from being a candidate for a third term. The introduction of the resolution and its source was a clear indication that the strength of the President in the country is recognized and that he is greatly feared by his opponents.

Personally, I have no doubt that, whether the resolution shall be adopted or rejected, it will not have the slightest effect upon the determination of the present occupant of the White House.

With much regret I have accepted the statement of the President in not being a candidate to succeed himself as final and conclusive, and I am convinced that nothing could happen which would change his determination.

That the resolution to a great extent is meaningless is practically admitted by at least some of its sponsors or supporters. They frankly say that they would not support an amendment prohibiting a third term as a part of the Constitution. They further admit that they would prefer at times to leave to the people the decision in a situation such as, in the minds of some, perhaps now confronts us.

If the proponents of this resolution feel that the Constitution should not be amended in this particular, but that the people should be given an opportunity to decide, then why do they support the resolution; why, from their standpoint, is there a necessity for the resolution?

We have heard much to the effect that the people should rule, and we know that ultimately the people do rule. This resolution is met by some of its supporters with the statement that it should not be a part of our fundamental law. Then, I repeat, it becomes simply a political gesture.

In my judgment the time of the Senate can be much better spent in the consideration of some of the legislation which the country hopes we will consider, rather than spending three or four days, and perhaps hours yet to come, in simply voting yea or nay on a political gesture which, its supporters admit, should ultimately be decided by the people.

I do not believe the people need or seek our advice in this particular.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Black	Borah	Broussard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not mean to take the time of the Senate for more than a moment or two to state my attitude on the pending resolution.

I am going to vote against the resolution, although I feel as I think the majority of the Senate feel, that in the ordinary case it is unwise for the people to elect the same man to more than two substantial terms in the Presidency. I put it in that way, because I mean that if a President has had a substantial term by succession to the elected President, in my judgment that is the equivalent, for all practical purposes, of an elective term.

I do not believe that, as a general rule, it would be wise to put this provision into the Constitution. I think we can all agree that it would have been to the infinite benefit of all of our people, in all probability, had President Lincoln served three full successive terms instead of one term and a few weeks. Had he been in office for eight years longer, most of the agony of reconstruction and the unwisdom of the reconstruction policies would, in all probability, have been avoided.

There may be exceptions, as I think there was an exception in that case. The people can be trusted to say whether the circumstances of a particular case justify a departure from this tradition. I do regard it as a tradition. I believe that most of the people of the United States regard it as a traditional policy of the people, and I hope that it will not be departed from except in emergencies or in remarkable cases.

As far as Mr. Coolidge is concerned, I do not believe that he has had two substantial terms as President of the United States. A term of one year and seven months by succession does not seem to me to constitute in substance a term as President of the United States. However that may be, the people are to say, not the Senate of the United States.

When we look at this resolution, and wonder what constitutional function the Senate would be exercising in adopting the resolution, we are met by nothing. If this were a constitutional amendment which the Senate were asked to propose, of course no one could question our authority to pass the resolution, but its proponents do not offer it as a constitutional amendment which we have authority to adopt. It is not legislation which we have authority to originate. It bears no relation to our powers over appointments or over treaties. There is nothing in the powers of the Senate which authorizes us to give advice on such matters, either to the President or to the people.

Our authority in this matter is exactly the same as that of the members of any old ladies' sewing society which adopts a resolution on the subject. We have 96 votes in our separate States as voters. So presumably have 96 old ladies in a sewing society. The advice which the Senate now undertakes to offer to the President and to the country carries not the sanction of the Senate as a constitutionally organized deliberative and legislative body, but of 96 individuals who happen for the moment to sit here in this Chamber.

Mr. EDGE. Ninety-four.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator corrects me. We are reduced to 94 because of our judgment that the people in two of our States are incapable of deciding for themselves whom they will have as Senators. This is but a repetition of that action of the Senate. We are now advising the people of the United States that because of their imbecility we will tell them whom to elect, how many times to elect him, how they shall gauge his eligibility and desirability for election. The Senate has taken upon itself the power of a board of directors in a large number of matters in which neither the Constitution nor the people who elected us intended us to function as their advisers. It means to some of us that we are usurping a power and giving advice for which the people of the country will not thank us, that we are giving advice which they neither need nor desire, and that we are giving advice to which neither they nor the President will pay the slightest attention.

Therefore, although I am in full sympathy, as I have said, with the tradition of the American people that, barring emergencies, it is sufficient to have one man in office for eight years as President, I do not believe that I can vote for the pending resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is only one feature of this subject to which I wish to recur for a brief moment. I think I have stated the view which I entertain with reference to the general proposition, and that is that under all ordinary circumstances the principle of the anti-third-term policy ought to prevail in our national affairs.

Last summer, when our President was at his summer home in South Dakota, he made a statement to the effect that he did not choose to be a candidate in 1928. I regarded that statement as conclusive against his candidacy at the time it was made, and so stated in the public press. At the time the President made the statement there was little or no doubt in the mind of anyone but that he would be renominated in case he chose to be a candidate.

I doubt very much if there would have been any opposition to him in the convention. He could not have made the statement for any other reason in the world than his desire not to be a candidate. Those who know the President know that he would not speak in idle fashion concerning a matter of that character. There could have been no possible reason from political strategy for him to have made the statement, even assuming he would heed political strategy. The situation was well within his control. In fact, to have remained silent was to have assured his renomination. I say I regard it as taking him out of the race.

Later the President made another statement which seemed to amplify his former statement, although in my judgment he added very little to it. He said:

> This is naturally the time to be planning for the future. The party will soon place in nomination its candidate to succeed me. To give time for mature deliberation I stated to the country on August 2 that I did not choose to run for President in 1928. My statement stands. No one should be allowed to suppose that I have modified it. My decision will be respected. After I had been eliminated the party began, and should vigorously continue, the serious task of selecting another candidate from among the number of distinguished men available.

Taking the two statements together, I regard our considering this resolution is at a time when no one as a candidate is proposing to violate the tradition which has obtained in this country practically since its organization. I am casting a vote at a time when, in my judgment, there is no possibility of the present incumbent being a candidate for reelection. He has settled that question himself, voluntarily and definitely settled it. As he said in his statement, "My decision will be respected." We know precisely what that means. He is completely out of the race. I do not, therefore, regard a vote here as having anything to do whatever with the President of the United States or his possible candidacy. I venture to say that he will control that as completely as it could be controlled even if we had the power to pass a law in regard to it.

I am called upon, therefore, to vote my mere personal views with reference to this tradition, and that personal view is that under all ordinary circumstances the tradition ought to prevail.

I would not write it into the Constitution. I would leave it where it is. But, generally speaking, I believe it a wise tradition. If I had been writing the resolution before us, I should not have expressed it as strongly as did the Senator who wrote it, because, while I regard it as sound, I can very well understand how conditions might arise in which it would be wise and patriotic to disregard the tradition.

But in view of the fact that the present situation is such that one may express his individual view at a time when it embarrasses no candidate and does not embarrass any individual who is to be a candidate, and when he may express simply his view as to a policy which has heretofore obtained, I expect to vote for the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator from Idaho really think that the second part of the resolution does not relate to the present circumstances and does not cast a certain amount of reflection on the question of whether the President may or may not run again?

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the second part of the resolution, the author of the resolution has interpreted the President's attitude as acquiescing in the tradition relating to a third term. It may be and probably is true that the President did not have in mind a third term when he retired, but nevertheless it was construed throughout the country and by the press and by individuals very generally as having entered into the thoughts of the President at the time he retired. I do not know of anyone who knows, and I doubt if anyone does know or ever will know, just what thoughts were in the mind of the President when he retired; yet the fact that he did retire, the fact that the third-term principle was under discussion when he did retire or that it was being discussed throughout the country in the press and by individuals naturally led to the general supposition that it entered into his mind at the time he retired from the candidacy.

I should like to feel that it did enter into the mind of the President, that it was a part and parcel of the things which made up his final judgment in regard to the matter. I should like to feel that a President who had the nomination in his grasp, absolutely under his control, who in all probability would have been reelected, stepped aside in deference to this tradition. I believe in strengthening the tradition and making exceptions to it only under those extraordinary circumstances which may in a measure amount to a national crisis.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator think, then, if he votes for the second part of the resolution that he is commending the President for something which he is about to do?

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly satisfied that in voting for the second part of the resolution I am in no way censuring nor in any way embarrassing the President of the United States. If it has any effect, it is complimentary to the action which he took. There is no more chance of the President being a candidate in the face of his two statements than if there were a constitutional inhibition against his being a candidate. We all know who know the President that no convention is going to pull him away from those declarations. He said, "My decision will be respected," and so it will. I do not regard, therefore, the present President as being in the slightest embarrassed by the resolution. If the convention should arise as one man and renominate him, I do not regard that the resolution would be at all hurtful to the President accepting the proposition. He would be guided by his own statements and by his sense of duty and patriotism.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then the Senator does not agree with the proponent of the resolution, who, as I understood him, described his reason for introducing the resolution as being a desire to offset the possibility of the President being drafted for another term?

Mr. BORAH. The author of the resolution undoubtedly had in mind a number of politicians in the United States who are taking shelter under the President's wing until they find a secure place to go. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does it seem to the Senator that those who are opposing the resolution as reflecting upon the President are themselves expressing a doubt as to the sincerity of the President when he said he would not be a candidate?

Mr. BORAH. I would not want to say that, but I have thought that those who have insisted and who have persistently given to the press statements that the President would be renominated and would accept, did in a measure challenge the intellectual integrity of the President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then those Senators who now say the resolution will embarrass the President certainly did not quite take seriously the President's statement that he is not a candidate?

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that they are contending that this would embarrass the President.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; they are not contending that, but that is what they say.

Mr. BORAH. As I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say, neither the President nor the convention will pay the slightest attention to it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then it does not embarrass the President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will yield to me at that point, I did not say that this would embarrass the President. I do not know whether it would embarrass the President or not. The point I make is that it ought to embarrass the Senate to offer a lot of unsolicited advice in a matter that is not any of its business.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, the Senator is always so solicitous about the good reputation of the Senate. He is so anxious to have it stand well that he wants to have Smith and VARE here to raise the general average. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he heard the statements of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who thought this was a cheap way to embarrass the President?

Mr. BORAH. I think with all due respect, and with great personal respect for my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who introduced the resolution, that by reason of his attitude on some other matters relative to the President the resolution has been a little misconstrued.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think it has been misconstrued.

Mr. BORAH. I think it has been. I think that if this resolution had been introduced by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] or any other leader here upon the Republican side it would have been construed as a commendation of the President in standing with Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe in favor of recognizing the tradition which has been established in this country.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator think that this resolution is intended to be complimentary to the President?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what was in the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I have no doubt, from my standpoint, that it is complimentary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it is intended to be complimentary to the President and is supported by Senators who call themselves "progressives," and by all of the Democrats in the Chamber, then to-day ought to go down as a red-letter day, ought it not?

Mr. BORAH. So far as the Democrats are concerned, they would be strikingly inconsistent if they did not vote for this resolution. It is a Democratic doctrine; it originated with Thomas Jefferson; it has been one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party from its organization to this time; and I can not conceive of a Democrat voting against the resolution if he believes in the principle which is one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party.

Mr. BLEASE, Mr. NORBECK, and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. BLEASE. I just want to thank my candidate for President for his high compliment by saying that I am going to vote against this resolution.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from South Carolina is very independent of individuals and political parties.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, speaking of the Democratic attitude toward a third presidential term, does the Senator from Idaho think if the Democrats vote for the resolution they will pay any more attention to it than they did when in the Baltimore platform they declared for a single term for President?

Mr. BORAH. I am not the keeper of the Democratic conscience, but I regard this as having been one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party for the last hundred years.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does that go along with State rights?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is one of the matters that go along with State rights.

Mr. WATSON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I shall do so in a moment. But this, Mr. President, has come to be also largely a Republican principle. While I am of the opinion that it originated with Jefferson and was confirmed by Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, when we came down to the time of Grant and to the great fight of 1912, the great Republican leaders, those who had control of the party and who finally made the nomination, were fighting the third term, and at that time it was regarded as a sound Republican principle by many of our leaders.

Now I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has said in the course of his remarks that there might come such an emergent condition that the nomination and even the election of a President for a third term would be wise and patriotic. Does the Senator from Idaho assume that attitude?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator think that if this resolution were carried into effect it would preclude the nomination and election of a President under those conditions?

Mr. BORAH. Not at all. Leaving out the old ladies' sewing society, to which my friend from Pennsylvania compared the Senate, I regard this as nothing more than the expression of the individual views of the Senators here upon this subject, the same as if I were called upon to give an interview or to write an article or to express myself in a public place. It would be my individual view concerning this matter. As to the Senate putting behind it the sanction, authority, and power of the Senate as a constitutional body to bind anybody by its action, of course, it does not exist; but that is not a prerequisite always to the action of the Senate. We have adopted resolutions time and time again with reference to matters which were wholly political. They come here, some Senator introduces them, a Senator is placed in the position where he must record his vote, and he does it as an individual or, rather, as a matter of fact, as a citizen.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to call to the Senator's recollection the resolution which was adopted on the 31st day of January, 1924, being Senate Resolution 134, submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which declared:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should ask for the resignation of the Secretary of the Navy, Charles Denby.

Mr. President, the same argument advanced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], that the Senate had no constitutional authority to act in that case, was advanced and has been advanced against resolutions of this character, but I submit that anyone who is familiar with that situation would not say that the action of the Senate did not bring about the resignation of Mr. Denby from the Cabinet.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President; I think it did, and I think it was one of the greatest injustices in the recent history of the Senate; but, if I may ask the Senator from Idaho a question, I think we are all agreed, and, so far as I know, Mr. Coolidge is agreed, that the policy that the resolution pretends to declare is a sound policy. There is no difference among us as to the desirability of adhering to the tradition.

Now, if I may give a parallel case without attempting to be ridiculous, we all believe in the observance of the Ten Commandments, and so does Mr. Coolidge, but it appears to me there would be something offensive and rather impertinent if we were to pass a resolution commending to him the observance of the Ten Commandments. So it is here. This is one of the commandments of the political life of America. Presumably he has it at heart as much as we have. We are all agreed on the principle. Is there not something impertinent in our recommending to the President the observance of this political tenet, which, so far as we know, he shares with us?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can not conceive of our recommending in this resolution anything to the President. The President has eliminated himself from the candidacy for President; he is out of the race.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why the resolution?

Mr. BORAH. My friend from Utah asks, Why the resolution? Notwithstanding the fact there are people in the country who are constantly debating this question. It is still being discussed in the press; politicians who are anxious in regard to the nomination are insisting upon it; and that, I presume, is why it is here. It has been a matter of public discussion and is still a matter of public discussion, and the Senate, while it can not bind by its action, certainly is not precluded from having a conviction or a view upon a matter of great political importance.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not in the least; but in the second paragraph of this resolution we commend the observance of this tradition by the President. That is advice; that is not commendation of the President. We do not commend the President; we commend the observance on his part. That is advice to him to observe it, as I read the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. My understanding of that portion of the resolution is that the Senator from Wisconsin construes the President's action to be in harmony with the tradition.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE and Mr. BLAINE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I understand the Senator from Idaho to agree with Washington when he says that—

Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

Of course, I agree with that. If that be so, I ask the Senator and the Senate to observe the language of this resolution, if I may address myself directly to the Senator——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I inquire exactly what secret information the Senator from California is imparting to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator from Virginia will give heed, I think he will understand me. I am not obliged to reply, but I do reply respectfully. I say I assume that the Senator from Idaho agrees with Washington?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, we all agree with Washington.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well; then I hope you will vote accordingly. But I wish to say to the Senator, who is so courteous, that if that be so, if there be emergencies of the character suggested, why, then, does the Senator propose to say that I am unpatriotic if I vote against this resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I do not say that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There may be emergencies——

Mr. GLASS. On the contrary, the Senator from California is the only Senator who has imputed unpatriotic motives to all of his colleagues here who propose to vote for the resolution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. On the contrary, I made no such imputation; none whatever. I am quoting Washington.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then we are all patriots.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And Washington insists that certain exigencies may arise when it would be proper, in his judgment, that a President should serve a third term. The form of this resolution is such that it would be said that those of us who voted against it are unpatriotic.

Mr. BORAH. I do not so construe it; neither do I construe it as having anything whatever to do with the future action of the President of the United States. If he had not made the statements which he did make, if he had not eliminated himself from candidacy for the Presidency, the Senator's argument would be unanswerable; we would be attempting here to control the President's action and in some way embarrass him; but he is as completely out of the race as are some of the many candidates who are running. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator has suggested that the adoption of this resolution would only mean an expression of the individual opinion of the individual Members of the Senate. Does it not go further and beyond being a mere expression of opinion?

The anti-third-term policy is traditional. It has its force not by some constitutional or legislative enactment, but it has grown out of circumstances. First the declaration of Washington, then a specific declaration of Jefferson, then declarations of Madison and Monroe or whosoever the Presidents were who repeated it, revived and kept alive that tradition.

Now we come down to a later period. As I understand, this tradition can only be perpetuated by acts in conformity with the original suggestion that initiated the tradition or by repetition of the expressions that involve the principle in respect to that tradition. Therefore, in order to strengthen the tradition and in order to keep it alive and in order to perpetuate it, had the President in his statement last summer absolutely declined under any circumstances to accept the nomination or reelection to the office of the Presidency, by that act, by those words he would have added or aided in the perpetuation of this tradition. Therefore, if this resolution shall be adopted will it not be an act of far more importance than the mere expression of individual opinion? Will it not rather be an expression of the opinion of a legislative body that gives it such force as to perpetuate it and hand it on to future generations as a policy of this Government as expressed by those who have public and official responsibility and certain duties with respect not only to our Constitution, but as well with respect to the traditions that have been started for us by those who founded this Republic? Will not that be the effect of the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am unable to give to the resolution the strength and importance which the Senator from Wisconsin seems to give to it. I am unable to do that for the reason that this is not one of the functions of the Senate. It is not one of the duties imposed upon us by the Constitution or by the authority granted to us under the Constitution.

In so far as the Senate has prestige in the country, in so far as its Members are regarded as representing the public thought of the country, thus expressing their public views upon this particular matter, it has influence in the country. It strengthens in that respect the tradition, and in my judgment only in that respect. But so far as I am individually concerned, as I say, I regard it simply as expressing my individual views upon this matter, since it is brought to me in the way it is in the Senate. It may have more strength and more prestige, more influence upon public opinion, by reason of its happening here than if 96 of us should meet outside, not as Members, and pass our judgment. There may be something connected with the Senate which the public does not disassociate from our individual acts which will give it more prominence and more prestige; but, nevertheless, so far as I am concerned it is expressive simply of my individual views as a citizen.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that in 1912 this matter was up for consideration, and it was a very vital matter with the Republicans of the country. It was discussed at length in the Senate and in the country. The Republican leaders at that time thought that the action of Colonel Roosevelt was in violation of the tradition established early in the history of our country. Some of us took the view then, as we do now, that it was a matter for the people to decide. If the people thought an exigency had arisen which justified departure from the tradition, it must be left to the judgment and conscience of the people to determine it, and nowhere else.

I stated at the time in the debate here, as I state now, that while upon all ordinary occasions we should observe the tradition, I was willing to leave it ultimately where it belonged, to the judgment of the people, and not incorporate it in the Constitution of the United States. That is precisely where I would leave it now; and in expressing my views to-day I express them as one of the people interested in this tradition, and believing in it under all ordinary circumstances, and in no other wise.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, if things continue as they are going, I think it will be well for the Senate to change its name from the "United States Senate" to "United States Supergrand Jury" and "Special Advisors of the People," and turn ourselves into investigators of other people's business and advisors to the people who created us.

I am opposed to resolutions which certainly are not law and have no legal effect. This resolution was first introduced when Mr. Coolidge was spoken of for a third term and the sentiment was very strong. It was allowed to die and stay dormant until again the third-term talk was commenced and then revived. It therefore seems to me, Mr. President, as it does to a great many others, who have so stated to me, that the resolution was introduced for the purpose of slapping Mr. Coolidge in the face, and endeavoring to create a sentiment over the country against his renomination.

Therefore I think it very unfortunate, to say the least, whatever may be the opinion of the Senate as to the third term, that the resolution should be considered just at this time.

Why not let us wait until after the next Republican National Convention and then pass it if we wish? It seems to me that that would be the wiser course to pursue.

The Springer resolution has been brought into the controversy. Everyone knows that that resolution was introduced as a direct slap in the face of President Grant and his Cabinet. When the question was asked yesterday it was distinctly stated that "that resolution prevented Mr. Grant's renomination"; and I came to the conclusion from that reply and from the source from which it came that this resolution was prompted by the Springer resolution and introduced for the same purpose, substituting Coolidge for Grant.

Certainly this resolution does not refer to George Washington, Ulysses S. Grant, or Theodore Roosevelt, who have been referred to in this debate. Then to whom does it refer? Of course, to Calvin Coolidge.

I was somewhat amused at some of the Democrats who seem to be voting for this resolution, especially when it was admitted that no man, not even Calvin Coolidge, "would ever be reelected to a third term." If we Democrats think that, then why not allow him to be nominated, so that we can defeat him? It seems to me that this is a case of whistling in the dark to keep up your courage.

Mr. President, my position is that we should let the people alone and let the people rule. If the people of the United States wish to elect a man for a third term, they have the constitutional right to do so; and the Senate, as their servants, have no right to attempt to prevent them from doing so.

Some Senators who now seem so very anxious to follow the example set by Washington and Jefferson must have recently changed their opinions of the example and advice of these two Presidents. When the League of Nations question was before the Senate, and when the World Court question was before the Senate, and when the question was before the Senate of depriving two States of the American Union of their representation upon the floor of the Senate, which is distinctly and positively prohibited by the Constitution, they seem to have had very little regard for what Washington or Jefferson had to say; and there have been other matters of national importance in which the advice of Washington and Jefferson has been totally ignored.

For instance, those gentlemen advocated and fixed as the policy of this country that each State should be entitled to two United States Senators, and that they should not be deprived of their representation in this body. However, when the roll is called each day, we find two of these States absolutely deprived of the representation advised and advocated by Washington and Jefferson. I can not see why their advice should be any more taken on this resolution than in those more important matters, and I think about this as I do those: Let the people speak as to who shall be their representatives, and when they shall have spoken let their will be respected.

I think we would be in a better position if we would listen to the people more and try to carry out their wishes, instead of trying to dictate to them what their wishes should be.

I am for the people first, last, and all the time, and letting them alone. They are the superior power; and whatever may be their wish, I always attempt to submit to. Therefore I shall vote against this resolution and allow the people to decide this question, and not a few partisans on either side of this Chamber, who, whatever may be their idea in the matter, I can assure them are being accused of passing this resolution for the sole political purpose of endeavoring to thwart the nomination of Mr. Coolidge.

Mr. President, on page 2618 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 7 this appears:

> Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The reason why I referred to the Springer resolution was because the Senator from Ohio a moment ago made the suggestion that the adoption of the pending resolution would have no effect. There are historians—although they may not, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, be as able or as well informed as he—who maintain that the passage of the Springer resolution was the very thing which put the quietus upon the Grant boom.

On page 2626 of the same date the following appears:

> Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?
> Mr. NORRIS. I yield.
> Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will not the Senator permit me to give some figures with regard to New England?
> Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Then ensued a controversy between the Senators from Connecticut, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Arkansas; and the Senator from Wisconsin finally said:

> Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; that is the exact language of the resolution.
> Mr. NORRIS. A copy of it.
> Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

I submit, Mr. President, that with that statement in the RECORD, and with the debate that has gone on upon this matter, there can be but one honest construction put upon this resolution. That honest construction is that it is feared by some people that the present occupant of the White House might be, as some people say, drafted for the Presidency; and this resolution, as said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], following the Grant resolution, and the Grant resolution having put a quietus upon the boom of Mr. Grant, that this resolution is intended for no other purpose except to put a quietus upon the renomination of Mr. Coolidge.

I am no apologist for Calvin Coolidge. He does not expect any defense at my hands; but I am responsible for my own conduct, and I feel that if I were to sit here and allow this resolution to go through without protest I would be untrue to my people—I mean, the American people. I do not mean the people of South Carolina alone, because they take no part in the nomination of a Republican candidate, except about six or eight negroes, and they will vote whichever way they get the most money for voting. I am speaking of the great people of this Nation. I say that we have not the right to pass this resolution. We may do it through might making right. There are thieves in the night, and there are thieves by might; and we, too, by might, can pass this resolution; but when we do it we are stepping beyond the pale of our duties as Senators, as I see it.

Why should we attempt to say to the American people that they shall or shall not do certain things?

That is my position, Mr. President.

The Senator from Wisconsin stated that the Springer resolution put the quietus upon the Grant boom. While I have a high regard for the opinion of every Senator here, I believe that this resolution was intended to do the same thing for Mr. Coolidge; and instead of hurting him, if you do not look out, you will be creating sentiment in the opposite direction.

You turned a man out of the Senate not long ago. You refused to let him in here. If you had let him be sworn in, tried him, and turned him out for conduct unbecoming a gentleman, he would have gone back to Illinois possibly in disgrace and never been heard of any more. As it is, you kept him out, and you have made a hero out of him. He has been reappointed. You will have to act on that. The people will resent your action. They will reelect him on the 10th of April, and he will come back here again, and you will have him for the third time knocking at your doors; while, if you had let him in and then kicked him out, as you should have done, and as I wanted to help you do, you would have been rid of him.

I believe firmly that if this resolution is passed by the Senate the American people will resent it; and, as I said a while ago, if we Democrats over here believe that nobody can be elected for a third time, why not let the Republicans go ahead and nominate Mr. Coolidge, and give us the chance to beat him?

Just one other thing, Mr. President.

Some people have a good deal to say about Mr. Washington. When Mr. Washington was President of the United States there were 3,929,214 people in this country. When Mr. Grant was President of the United States there were 38,558,371 people in this country. When Mr. Coolidge took the oath of office as President of the United States five years ago there were 111,693,030 people in this country, with a strong probability that to-day there are between 120,000,000 and 125,000,000 people in this country.

Mr. President, with all due respect to President Washington, I have no doubt that if he had been down at his home in Mount Vernon and had seen an airship coming across while he was President, he might have ordered out the entire American Army and Navy to find out what that thing was. I have no doubt that if Mr. Jefferson had been coming up to Washington in his buggy he might have shot at a man passing in an automobile. What may have been done by the 3,000,000 people of that day and time, in the conditions and circumstances surrounding them, is no precedent for us to-day, with possibly 120,000,000 people facing modern conditions.

Mr. President, I did not care to make any speech on this question; I merely wanted to put in the RECORD my views on the matter and to state why I expect to vote as I shall vote.

Mr. President, I think the only chance the Democrats have to win is to combine the South and the West. I heard some Democratic Senators say a while ago that they did not think it made much difference who was nominated on either side, that they did not think the Democrats had a chance. I think we are putting ourselves further from the chance when we take up four or five days in the Senate discussing a resolution that can not be made into law, that can not bind anybody, that would not affect anybody. The 120,000,000 people of this country can say, "Yes; 40 or 50 Senators voted that a man should not have a third term, but we have a right to say, and to also say whether those Senators shall have a second term or not."

I think it is unfortunate that this resolution was brought into the Senate. I think it will be unfortunate for the Senate to pass it. I would not be at all surprised, if the Senate should pass the resolution, that they would find in the country a resentment for slapping in the face a man who has no opportunity to reply. I have always had a contempt for a preacher who would get up in the pulpit and abuse somebody because he knew there could be no reply to him. I always had a contempt for a lawyer who would get up in the courthouse and take advantage of a witness and abuse him because he knew he had a judge and a lot of bailiffs to keep the witness from jumping up and beating the devil out of him. I believe in standing face to face with a man.

I believe the Republicans and the Progressives should go to their conventions and that the Democrats should go to their convention, and that we should there fight out our party questions. But when it comes to legislating for the great American people in this body we should be one and act for all the people of this country, regardless of factions or parties.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to call for a quorum, and then ask unanimous consent that we shall take a recess for 10 minutes, in order to pay our respects to and shake hands with the French aviators, Lieut. Dieudonné Costes and Lieut. Commander Joseph Lebrix, who are now waiting to come into the Chamber. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	La Follette	Shortridge
Barkley	Ferris	McKellar	Simmons
Bayard	Fess	McMaster	Smith
Bingham	Fletcher	McNary	Smoot
Black	Frazier	Mayfield	Steck
Blaine	George	Moses	Steiwer
Blease	Gerry	Neely	Stephens
Borah	Gillett	Norbeck	Swanson
Bratton	Glass	Norris	Thomas
Brookhart	Gooding	Nye	Trammell
Broussard	Gould	Oddie	Tydings
Bruce	Greene	Overman	Tyson
Capper	Harris	Pine	Wagner
Caraway	Harrison	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hawes	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Hayden	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Curtis	Heflin	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Cutting	Howell	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Dale	Johnson	Sackett	Wheeler
Deneen	Jones	Schall	Willis
Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Edge	King	Shipstead

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

RECEPTION OF LIEUT. COMMANDER JOSEPH LEBRIX AND LIEUT. DIEUDONNÉ COSTES, FRENCH AVIATORS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 10 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senate will stand in recess until 3.05 o'clock.

The Senate being in recess, the Vice President escorted the French aviators, Lieut. Commander Joseph Lebrix and Lieut. Dieudonné Costes, accompanied by Mr. Paul Claudel, the French ambassador, into the Chamber, where they were greeted with great applause.

The Vice President, the ambassador from France, and the French aviators stood in the area near the Secretary's desk, and Mr. CURTIS, the majority leader, and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, the minority leader, personally presented the Members of the Senate to the distinguished visitors, after which they retired from the Chamber amid great applause from the floor and the galleries.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The recess having expired, the Senate resumed its session and continued the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the scenario which the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has filmed is one of interest and amusement. It is full of tragedy as well as comedy. It is a pity that it is only within the walls of this Chamber that it is being portrayed and that it could not be reproduced elsewhere so the country might visualize on the screen the incidents that have happened here, the pathos, the sympathy, and the tragedy; the looks of disgust upon the part of certain embryo Presidents; the expressions of anxiety upon the part of certain would-be Vice Presidents; the fright that some might be punished by the gentleman in the White House if they should take certain positions with reference to the matter; the ambitious looks on the part of others who would be legatees to all the mischievements of the administration.

It is an amusing situation that confronts the Senate. My heart goes out to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] because they are in a bad fix when it comes to voting upon this particular resolution. This is not a Democratic conception. We have nothing in the world to do with it. Of course, in the discharge of our duty here we have to vote on it. But the resolution originated on the other side of the aisle. I would vote gladly to excuse the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Indiana, and the senior Senator from Ohio from voting on the proposition because I know, as you know, Mr. President, and as they know, that if they vote for it the President might chastise them as he chastised on one occasion the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and that it might be misconstrued in the country that these embryonic presidential possibilities really do not want the President to be a candidate for renomination.

Everybody knows that the Senator from Kansas, the senior Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Indiana do not care if President Coolidge is a candidate for renomination. They would battle for the nomination just the same if he were a candidate. So, as far as that matter is concerned, it does not give them any concern. But if they vote against the resolution then they will have to answer also, because they are then put in the attitude that they do not believe in the time-honored tradition of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, and that really they thought the President was insincere and hypocritical and that they did not believe him when he said he did not choose to run for President again. They do not want to be put in that attitude, and yet the country will accept their action in that way.

Here we have talked for several days—that is, Senators on the other side of the Chamber have—about the pending resolution. Following the action of the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio yesterday in his three-hour discussion and the long speech of the eucalyptian gentleman from California this morning [laughter], I am inclined to believe that there is a well-oiled filibuster against the resolution and that Senators on the other side of the aisle want to hold it here until after the Republican convention shall have met and nominated somebody. Then they might believe, when Mr. Coolidge is not renominated, that they are free to vote upon this particular proposition.

Here is the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who stated yesterday with vigor, and the papers throughout the country accepted it and the people will do likewise, that the President is still a candidate for renomination and that he will accept it if it is given to him, because yesterday the junior Senator from Ohio admitted that he was so close to the President that even when they visited together at the White House and he left, his statements were likely to be accepted as the views of the President. I believe that is the language he employed when the President slapped him upon the wrist with a piece of chewing gum and said, "Simeon, don't do it again." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, evidently the distinguished Senator from Ohio had good reasons for the position he took. That is why there was so much confusion about the proposition for so long a time. After the President had seen him in the White House and upbraided and chastised him, and was so influential with him even as to cause the distinguished Senator from Ohio to go outside and tell a falsehood to the representatives of the newspapers of the country, he persisted in saying that "notwithstanding what the President has done, I am still for his renomination."

I am glad the Vice President has just entered the Chamber and taken the chair, because he is the only one, except those of us on this side of the aisle, who is wholly disinterested in the controversy that is waging on the other side of the Chamber. Of course, it makes no difference to us whether President Coolidge is renominated or some one else is nominated, and it makes no difference to our distinguished Vice President either. [Laughter.] He is giving no concern about it at all. He has made his position so clear that everybody knows he is not a candidate for President of the United States. [Laughter.] If President Coolidge had been as clear in his statement as has our distinguished Vice President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] could not have confused the issue and persisted in being for the President.

Mr. President, I want to read what the distinguished Senator from Ohio has said about the President's position. Of course, I am not going to read the headlines in the papers of October 21 of last year, which said "Coolidge rebukes FESS." I shall not do that, because yesterday the Senator made his confession. But I want to read from an utterance of the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio following that incident. This is carried in the New York Times.

I must admit that the Senator did grow a little cold on the President following this occurrence, and that for a while it seemed as though he had warmed up to the forces of the Willis crowd of Republican leaders in Ohio and was really for his colleague. He acted as though he was true to him for a while. He stopped talking that Coolidge renomination stuff, but all of a sudden something changed the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio. Was it because Congressman BURTON, of Ohio, came out for Hoover and started a fight in Ohio and the situation got mixed up and then the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio thought he would go back to his first love and renominate him for President of the United States? Here is what the Senator said, if he is quoted correctly. Of course, he may not have been, but Mr. Oulahan is a most reputable correspondent and this is a very reputable paper:

As given to the New York Times to-day, the comment of Senator FESS was as follows—

This was October 22 of last year, several days following the chastisement that the President had administered to the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio—

"He said he did not choose to run," said Mr. FESS. "He did the same thing when he was president of the Massachusetts Senate and was being urged to run for lieutenant governor. He followed the same tactics," said Senator FESS, "when he was Governor of Massachusetts and was prevailed upon to become a candidate for President of the United States. It is the Coolidge way"—

Said the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio, who admits himself to be so close to the President and to know him so well—

"It is the Coolidge way of doing things. It is the Coolidge psychology"—

Said the junior Senator from Ohio—

"It is my opinion that the mere fact that the President does not say something more in the face of general public clamor is proof that he intends to accept the nomination when it is offered him."

Those are the words of the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio, who yesterday spoke against the resolution and who has been the most persistent leader in the country for the renomination of President Coolidge. Consistency? Why, Mr. President, back here a little while ago the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio gave out other statements, speaking about the President and the tenure of the President in office:

The situation is greatly aggravated by the eligibility to reelection. Not infrequently much of the energy of the head of the administration during the first term is extended in getting ready for reelection—

Said the junior Senator from Ohio—

Ineligibility for reelection would remove the ground which to-day makes the President too much the head of the party rather than the head of the Government, no matter how much he might detest the discrimination. The six or seven years is long enough to develop a real policy, and would enable the administration to accomplish better results than two terms of four years each, because of the overemphasis of party success rather than of the general good.

Those were the views five years ago of the distinguished Senator from Ohio before he became so close to the distinguished President of the United States. Ah, Mr. President, he is not unlike Mark Antony, who, in his funeral oration over the body of Julius Cæsar, said:

> You all did see that on the Lupercal
> I thrice presented him a kingly crown,
> Which he did thrice refuse.

No, the Senator would follow the action of that historic character.

Mr. President, I submit that with the resolution before the Senate we must not overlook the fact that every Senator who has spoken against the resolution, save one, went out in 1912, in the fight within the Republican Party as to whether Theodore Roosevelt would be nominated or William Howard Taft; and at that time fought the renomination of Theodore Roosevelt.

In their speeches, I dare say—and I call upon them now to disclaim it if it is not true—they went from one end of their States to the other saying that Roosevelt should not be elected because it would be in contravention of the traditions of the Government and the precedent established by Washington, Madison, and Jefferson. That was the main contention that they waged against Roosevelt at that time. I asked the distinguished and golden-throated Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] to-day if in that campaign he did not travel from one end of California to the other using those arguments in behalf of his candidate. He stated if the newspapers quoted him in that way that he did not think it was true.

Senators on the Republican side know what the issue was. They are changing front here. Some of them are voting one way or the other, being actuated by various motives which prompt them, some hoping that they may be the legatee of the President in the White House; others thinking it might bring them closer to him, so that they can get more patronage from him. However, I submit, Mr. President, that when they vote to eliminate from the resolution the words—

Resolved, That the Senate commends the observance of this precedent by the President—

they put themselves on record as disbelieving in the sincerity of their own President. They vote to put themselves in the attitude that they refuse to commend him for observing the tradition of the past.

We have more faith in Calvin Coolidge than some of the Senators on the other side who are close to him have in him. Of course, they know him better than we do. That may be the reason that prompts them. [Laughter.] But we believe that he meant what he said when he stated what he did, even though nobody understood it exactly at that particular time. When he elaborated upon it and amplified it to the national committee, of course everybody then understood what he meant. However, if we had any doubt about it, it was all eliminated when the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] threw his hat into the ring and began to make an aggressive fight for the nomination. [Laughter.]

I have said all I wish to say. I am going to vote for the resolution and uphold the President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to suggest a way out of the dilemma in which some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber find themselves. These candidates for President who are hoping that Mr. Coolidge will not run are disturbed by the presence of this resolution. If they will all vote for the resolution and tell the President that they are backing him up and supporting him in the position that he has taken all will be well, at least so far as their candidacy is concerned. If the President should frown upon them, they can say, "Well, did you not mean what you said when you said you did not choose to run?" So that is the way out of this dilemma for the distinguished candidates for the Presidency on the other side of the Chamber.

Now I want to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. He said that the expression of opinion in this body upon this question is no more than the expression of an old women's sewing society composed of 96 women. Mr. President, this body has the power to confirm all the appointments of any consequence of the President. It has the power to impeach the President himself. The President can not—he can not obtain pay for his services except by the consent of the Senate. This body has the power to ratify treaties with foreign governments, and they can not be ratified except by its consent. The Senate is peculiarly the body selected by the founders of this Government to be on the housetop watching out for any evil that might approach, calling attention to dangers that might come from any quarter, and certainly to preserve the ancient landmarks of the fathers.

The two-term tradition is as much a part of this Government as if it were written in the Constitution or the law so far as the sanction of the American people is concerned. They believe in it and they want it respected; and Senators who fool themselves and think that the people will think that we are trying to offend the President upon a great question like this are, indeed, amusing as well as deceiving themselves.

Let me tell you, Mr. President, what will happen if the Senate fails and refuses to pass this resolution. The Senate will have shown to the country that it has no conviction on the subject and no desire to prevent a step toward monarchy in America. The Senate can not afford to refuse to adopt this resolution. The Senate must go on record as protesting against any step toward monarchy. A President with the power to fill the offices of this country, to direct legislation, to veto it, to bestow favors upon powerful interests, can build a machine that would be almost impregnable. He could, by using his power, nominate himself for a second term and also for a third term.

If this custom shall ever be broken in any particular it will be effectively broken. The Senator from Pennsylvania has stated that he would not favor breaking the two full-term custom; that he would not favor breaking that precedent; but where a President has had part of a term and has had, in addition, one full term, he is willing for him to have another. Mr. President, I repeat that if this precedent shall be broken at all the barriers will have been burned away, and thereafter any political party can insist, "Oh, well, that question has been up in the Senate, has been discussed, and then thrown into the wastebasket; Coolidge was elected three times, and some other President was elected three times, and the way is open for you." Senators, this is no child's play; it is a serious matter, affecting the future well-being of the Republic and the life of this Government. Washington pointed the way. He said, in effect, "I refuse to be considered for a third term; that is the precedent I set." And this great Government, the greatest in all the world, has observed it to this good day. I am going to cast my vote for the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to qualify one observation of his?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that treaties negotiated by the President must be ratified by the Senate. That, of course, is the constitutional requirement, but the Senator will recall that when the Senate recently refused to ratify a treaty, a modus vivendi was entered into under the terms of which the rejected treaty was to be put into effect and given vitality.

Mr. HEFLIN. Which ought not to be permitted. Mr. President, the Senate ought to assert itself.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to ask the Senator from Utah to what modus vivendi he refers?

Mr. KING. I refer to the modus vivendi which was negotiated in the summer of 1927 between the United States and Turkey, under the terms of which, as I interpret them, the provisions of the Lausanne treaty were to be regarded as in effect and the American ambassador sent to Turkey was to treat some of the provisions of the treaty as being in effect.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the Senator will ascertain upon investigation that he is in error in regard to this matter. That which the President did in regard to the Turkish situation was unquestionably within the power of the President to do. He made no effort in any way to put into effect the Lausanne treaty, and it is not in effect at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I differ with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. If that part of the modus vivendi which in effect declared that the principles of international law should obtain in the relations between the two countries, then my eminent friend would be correct; but I think that a careful perusal of the terms of the modus vivendi will show that it goes further than that and attempts to put into operation the treaty, or some of its provisions, which had been rejected by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I think, Mr. President, I will be able to convince the Senator, when we get all the facts, that I am not in error. Because of a statement which the Senator made some time ago, I had occasion personally to investigate this matter, and I am quite sure that he is in error as to the facts.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in order to relieve the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and the equally distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] of all possible embarrassment to which their voting for this resolution might subject them, I offer an amendment to be added at the end of the last paragraph of the resolution, as follows:

Provided, That if the President should change his mind and choose to become a candidate for reelection the last paragraph of this resolution shall be held to be null and void.

[Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order at this time. There is a motion pending to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEELY. Then I ask that my amendment may lie on the table, subject to be called up when it becomes in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to refer Senate Resolution 128 to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest and some edification to the mellifluous eloquence of my distinguished friend, the silver-tongued orator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. He is always ready to come to the aid of the Republicans in time of need and to give us the pleasure of listening to the good advice which he thinks we so greatly need from time to time. Never does he rise to address us that I do not sit back comfortably in my chair and know that something delightful and worth listening to is coming. I was particularly glad to-day to hear him say that he had so much faith in the President. It is refreshing to find that he has changed his mind since he delivered that wonderful oration in Madison Square Garden on the occasion of so much harmony in his party, when the references which he made to the present President of the United States were not exactly in line with what he said to-day.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator must have a long memory.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not wonder that the Democrats have a short memory in regard to that occasion, Mr. President. I only hope that the 4-H Club that is going to meet down in Texas next June will be easier for them to remember.

Furthermore, the direful prophecies of the modern white-robed Cassandra from Alabama with regard to the danger of our becoming a monarchy are also duly noted on this side of the Chamber. We regret that he has so much pessimism in regard to the Republicans. His direful prophecies, however, I understand, are in the nature of precious advice and warning to us. Just why we need all this advice is a little mysterious.

A few weeks ago, Mr. President, we on this side of the aisle looked on in silence and amusement while the Democratic convention was in progress on the other side of the aisle. But we offered no warning or advice. We saw presidential candidates, including the one who has so recently told us that personally he preferred two terms, holding forth in a manner that brought clouds of grief to the brow of my distinguished friend from Mississippi, who looked as though the only thing he desired was some way of escape from the Chamber. When the Democratic convention was in progress on the other side of the aisle we did not rush in with eloquence and advice, but stayed quietly on our own side, hoping that they would settle it all in a harmonious manner, as was done a few days later, when the distinguished Cassandra from Alabama said that words uttered apparently in earnestness actually were uttered merely in jest.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, this resolution does not appear to me really to concern the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. Why should they care so much about it? They have no third-term candidate in view. They need not worry about the proprieties or the principles involved, or the precedents likely to be established. That is a matter which the Republican convention has to worry about. Nevertheless, although the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has told us to-day that this did not concern them, they have spent a great deal of time considering it, and have shown an almost sensitive, tender interest in what was going on.

Indeed, the distinguished Senator from Alabama has several times urged us to pass the resolution immediately. True, his personal preferences in regard to two terms can not be put into effect unless he can secure at least one term, Mr. President. Is it that his chances of securing one term seem to depend upon the thought that if we do not pass this resolution somebody else may be nominated for a third term?

Mr. President, as has often been said before, we fear the Greeks when bearing gifts. This touching interest in our welfare which has been shown by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle leads one to suspect that they fear that if, through force of circumstances, the present occupant of the White House should be chosen by the Republican convention and should run, their chances of having a President in the White House might go glimmering. Can this be the cause of so much interest and advice?

Actually, Mr. President, the question before us is a motion to refer the resolution to the committee. I should like to give very briefly two or three reasons why it seems to me that this matter ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the first place, the point arises as to whether it is a proper resolution for us to consider. The Constitution gives us certain legislative duties. Is it not true that lately the Senate has come into disrepute through a large part of the country, due to the fact that we so often neglect our legislative duties to become a grand jury, or to become a band of prosecuting attorneys, or to become a group of investigators and inquisitors, not so much with the intention of perfecting legislation as in an effort to purify and uplift the American public? We have neglected our legislative duties. In this kind of resolution it seems to me we are neglecting them again. Therefore, I think this resolution should be referred to a committee to see whether it is a proper resolution for us to consider.

In the second place, if the resolution is a proper one, is it in the best possible language? Is it not possible to amend the resolution so that it might more nearly meet the views of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], so that in case of grave national emergency there might be no cloud on the necessity of securing a President for a third term, as, for example, in time of war?

In the third place, Mr. President, if it is not a proper resolution, ought not that committee to consider very carefully whether or not an amendment to the Constitution ought to be offered for our consideration? If all the eloquence that has been heard in regard to a third term be founded on sound public policy and be wise, then surely there ought to be some amendment to the Constitution so that in case the public goes crazy over some popular military hero then it might be restrained by a constitutional provision preventing his consideration.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I hope very much that this resolution may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Its distinguished chairman, its distinguished membership, assure us that there is no danger of its being, as my friend from Alabama believes, a "wastebasket." There is no danger of its being considered a "chloroform chamber," as has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin. There is every reason to believe that under the distinguished chairmanship of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the resolution will receive earnest consideration and will be put in such shape that all of us who truly believe in the ancient traditions and landmarks of the Nation may have an opportunity of expressing ourselves by voting on such an amendment to the Constitution as they might propose. So we might avoid the accusation which has been leveled against us by many newspapers and many public men throughout the country of wasting our time considering and passing resolutions which the Constitution never intended us to consider and which in no way lie in the realm of legislation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, just one word in reply to the Senator.

He referred to what transpired on this side a few days ago on the Hearst-Mexican-Catholic scandal, and incidentally he referred to something that I said concerning tar and feathers, used figuratively and in fun, of course, when replying to the Senator from Arkansas. I am sure that the Senator does not for a moment believe that I intended that remark to be taken seriously. I have not found a Senator in this Chamber on either side who thought that I made that retort seriously to the Senator from Arkansas, and neither have I found anybody outside of this Chamber who hold to such a view except three feeble-minded persons, and I am having them examined for entry into St. Elizabeths Asylum. [Laughter.] No person with any gray matter above his eyes believes that I intended that remark seriously. Only those who have scrambled eggs and mayonnaise dressing in their heads took that remark seriously. [Laughter.]

In all seriousness I want to say this to the distinguished Senator, however: He talked as though this were a partisan political matter and we were trying to meddle with the Republican Party's program. Senators, Washington warned against this very situation. He told us to be on guard always against the partisan spirit and to let our country's welfare stand above it on all occasions. I say to you to-day in all seriousness, whether the occupant of the White House be a Democrat or a Republican, I will vote, every chance I get, to stand by this great principle laid down by Washington. We ought to do everything in our power every time we get a chance to hold this Government true to the purpose of its creation. We ought not to fling aside its best interests for the partisan welfare of anybody or any party. We ought to put country above party. Then let Democrats and Republicans alike here to-day show their patriotism, their willingness to do the right thing, regardless of party considerations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDWARDS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Illinois were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

Mr. CARAWAY (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who I find is absent. When my name was called I voted "nay," but not knowing how the Senator from Rhode Island would vote were he present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote were he present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] is detained from the Senate on official business, and that if he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (after having voted in the negative). I rise to inquire whether the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. ASHURST. I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from New Hampshire, and being unable to secure a transfer, I respectfully withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 52, as follows:

So the Senate refused to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia desire a vote on his amendment?

Mr. NEELY. By all means, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That if the President should change his mind and choose to become a candidate for reelection, the last paragraph of this resolution shall be held void and of no effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment. After line 8, following the colon, I move to strike out all the balance of the paragraph, consisting of the words "And be it further resolved, That the Senate commends the observance of this precedent by the President."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, does the Senator desire to make a statement with regard to the amendment?

Mr. FESS. Not unless the Senator from Wisconsin is opposed to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to make a statement concerning it in my own time. I want to accept the amendment, but I desire to make a statement concerning it.

Mr. FESS. I do not care to be heard if the Senator is going to accept it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds, may we have the proposed amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Ohio offers the following amendment: On page 1, to strike out, on lines 8, 9, and 10, the words "And be it further resolved, That the Senate commends the observance of this precedent by the President."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, much of the debate on this resolution has gone afield into the consideration of potential political developments, in which I have no concern, and which, in my judgment, add nothing to the importance of the principle involved in the resolution now before the Senate.

I did not offer the resolution with any concern whatsoever for its possible effect, for good or ill, upon the political fortunes of President Coolidge or any other individual or any political party or faction. My concern was and is for the maintenance of a traditional principle as old as the Government itself, that no man should hold the presidential office for a longer period than eight years, or more than once employ the kingly power and prestige of the office to renominate himself and thus destroy that principle. That is my position at this hour.

I first offered a resolution on this subject on February 22, 1927, in exactly the form in which it was adopted by the House of Representatives in 1875 by the overwhelming majority of 234 to 18. That resolution had the support of Garfield, Hoar, Frye, Hale, and all the eminent Republicans and Democrats in the House of Representatives of that day. That resolution was introduced and adopted when it appeared that President Grant might be a candidate for a third term in 1876.

When I introduced the resolution on February 22 last it was generally accepted that President Coolidge would be a candidate for renomination, and I regarded the two-term principle as being in immediate jeopardy. On August 2, 1927, the President issued his statement, "I do not choose to run for President in 1928." On December 6 he amplified and emphasized that statement with a declaration which until recently has been generally interpreted, even by some of his immediate and warmest friends, to mean that he would not be a candidate.

Accordingly, I added to the resolution introduced by me a year ago a clause declaring the commendation of the Senate for the observance of this time-honored precedent.

I added this clause in good faith and in all sincerity in order to avoid the charge that because of my political opposition to the policies of President Coolidge I had attempted to get the Senate by implication to go on record to the effect that it did not take the President at his word in the statements issued by him on August 2 and December 6.

Nevertheless, within the last few days some of the prominent and powerful organization leaders of the Republican Party, notable among the number being National Committeeman Hilles, of New York, have openly and publicly proceeded to launch a movement to "draft" President Coolidge in utter disregard of the principles for which I am contending.

Until I heard the address of the Senator from Ohio yesterday I did not believe it was possible that the President's statements could be interpreted otherwise than as being conclusive, nor did I believe, following the December 6 statement, that he could be induced to yield to such a movement and thereby repudiate the assurance he has given the country and his party, as I interpret it, and thus to attempt the destruction of the anti-third-term tradition.

To my astonishment, and I think to the astonishment of the country, the President's closest political friends in the Senate, led by the Senator from Ohio, object to the clause of commendation on the ground that the President did not, by the express language which he employed, foreclose his acceptance of a nomination if it were tendered him by the convention.

In view of the sources from which this objection emanates, and in view of the authentic character which must be given their interpretation of the President's intent, I accept the amendment to the resolution striking out the concluding paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would not accept the amendment, because, while I myself do not care for a roll call, there are some of us who would like to vote on the amendment. I am opposed to the amendment. If the Senator accepts it, of course it will go in as a part of the resolution, and we would have no vote on it. The Senator can accept the amendment, and I presume with his favor it will be adopted, but I wish the Senate might have a vote on it. Otherwise those who want to vote on the question would have to offer an amendment covering the same matter as an addition to the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. My understanding was that the Senator said that so far as he was concerned he would accept it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; it is my intention, as the author of the resolution, for the reasons which I have stated, and which I was continuing to state, to accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment can be reoffered by any Senator from the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President. I accept this amendment, because the resolution of commendation adds nothing to the force of the first resolution nor to the weight of the Senate's declaration at this time, in view of the situation, against the breach of the two-term tradition.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the elimination of this concluding paragraph upon the insistence and demand of the President's intimate friends and supporters more sharply emphasizes the importance and the direct implication contained in the body of the resolution.

Let there be no misunderstanding, and I think there should be none, in view of the frank statements made by me at the time this resolution was introduced, and during its consideration as to its import and intended effect. Without regard to personalities involved, it is a direct expression of the Senate's adherence to and determination to maintain this important and sound tradition. The urgent necessity for its adoption by the Senate is only emphasized by the attitude in which his most intimate friends and hearty supporters have placed President Coolidge during the course of this debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall not offer as an amendment the language which has been taken out of the resolution by its author, but I can not permit the occasion to pass without just a few words upon the subject.

As a friend of the President, as an old liner and a stalwart, I want to protest against this motion favored and backed by a few New England and mid-west radicals. [Laughter.] I take it that those who favor the amendment are unfriendly to President Coolidge. I think it is a slap at the President, and as a bitter partisan supporter of the President, I want publicly to resent it.

Here is a resolution to be passed by this high legislative body in which we directly commend the President for a patriotic act that he did. We undertake to give him a compliment for following in the line, the pathway, and the footsteps of Washington, Jefferson, and other illustrious leaders in our country. Then here come a few earnest, perhaps, honest, perhaps, but ill-advised insurgents, and they insist that we shall insult the President of the United States, that at least we shall not commend him for following in the footsteps of Washington. His enemies may say, and will say, I think, that in this case we ought to commend him because those like the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and his followers, who are backing up the motion, would probably say that we ought not to establish this kind of a precedent. They could say, they might say, and I fear they will say, that the President has so seldom followed in the footsteps of Washington, Jefferson, and others of our illustrious forefathers, that they do not want to establish a precedent now by commending him in this case where he has done it.

I want to warn these obstreperous Senators that they are treading on dangerous ground. There are those of us who are patriotically trying to back up the President in every good thing that he does, who will not forget this conduct and this attempt to really criticize the President. The President himself will not forget it. A man of his ability and his temperament will remember it as some Senators here have had occasion to know that he has remembered things like this in the past. He ought to remember it. I should not be surprised if in the proper following out of his constitutional duty, now established, to declare war without the consent of Congress, these Senators who are undertaking to strike out of the resolution this clause of praise and commendation to the President will find themselves drafted into the marines [laughter] and used for the purpose of bringing about fair elections in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may we have the resolution read now as it would read as amended?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I understand the amendment I proposed has been accepted and there will be no vote on it. I wish to offer a further amendment. In line 4, after the word "second," I move to insert the word "elective," so it would read "after the second elective term." I do not care to debate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "second," insert the word "elective," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second elective term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, his amendment would mean that the President would have to be elected two times. He might serve 3 years and 11 months of a term to which he succeeded as Vice President, but under the amendment that service would not count; he would have to have two elections.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senate will easily recognize the meaning of the word "elective."

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. We have had six Presidents who have been promoted from the Vice Presidency.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then he might serve 11 years and 11 months——

Mr. FESS. Yes; and he might serve eight years and one day, too.

Mr. HEFLIN. He might serve 11 years and 364 days, as a Senator sitting near me suggests, and still under the Senator's amendment he could have two full terms by being elected to them.

Mr. FESS. He could. This means simply that the American people can, if they want to, elect a man the second time, although he has served a portion of a term to which he came without being elected to that term, but was, under the Constitution, promoted to that term. I do not care to discuss the amendment. It is understood by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ASHURST (when his name was called). Being unable to obtain a transfer of my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], I withhold my vote.

Mr. EDWARDS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CARAWAY. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—6

So Mr. FESS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to offer an amendment, to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It is in line with his remarks this afternoon. In line 6, after the word "custom," I move to insert the words "except in a case of grave national emergency."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the resolution. In line 7, after the word "unwise," I move to strike out the words "unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The last amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio which was voted on constituted an interpretation of the intent and true meaning of the resolution. We have been discussing the resolution now for several days, and I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio last voted upon, and which was rejected by a vote of 70 opposed to the amendment to 6 in favor of it, disclosed that the Senate fully understands the resolution. I think that it will not be necessary to amend it.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ASHURST (when his name was called). For the day I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. EDWARDS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN]. If he were present, I am informed that he would vote "yea." As I intend to vote in the affirmative, I am permitted to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I am informed by his colleague the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I am advised, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—56

Ashurst	Cutting	Howell	Sackett
Barkley	Dill	Johnson	Schall

So the resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 281, being House bill 7201, known as the alien property bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to proceed to the consideration of House bill 7201.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator if he will not allow the bill to be temporarily laid aside, so that I may make a request.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am advised that a number of Senators will be away to-morrow, and I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2656) to establish a minimum area for a Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 473. An act authorizing the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.;

H. R. 7013. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928;

H. R. 7902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.; and

H. R. 8269. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. THOMAS presented sundry memorials numerously signed by citizens of the State of Oklahoma, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BINGHAM presented a resolution adopted by Ben Miller Council, No. 11, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Danbury, Conn., protesting against repeal of the national-origins provisions of the existing immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Connecticut State Federation of Women's Clubs, indorsing the so-called McSweeney bill, to facilitate research as to methods of forest production and conservation, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Cromwell, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed naval building program, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a resolution adopted by the Little Rock (Ark.) Engineers' Club, favoring the passage of Senate bill 851, affording relief to relatives of persons losing their lives in the disaster to the U. S. S. Norman, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Southern States Conference of Beekeepers' Associations, favoring inclusion in the next census of provision for the enumeration of colonies of bees excepting those on farms, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Southern States Conference of Beekeepers' Associations, protesting against the passage of the proposed corn sugar bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Southern States Conference of Beekeepers' Associations, favoring the making of an additional appropriation of $10,000 (through the Department of Agriculture) to establish in the South a field laboratory for the solving of certain problems relative to the beekeeping industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Arkansas, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. COPELAND presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted at the seventy-third annual meeting of the New York State Horticultural Society at Rochester, N. Y., favoring the passage of the so-called Borah bill establishing a licensing system for dealers and commission men handling fruits and vegetables, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PROF. WILLIAM H. H. HART

Mr. CURTIS presented certain papers and documents, which were referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany the bill (S. 2325) for the relief of Prof. William H. H. Hart, principal of the Hart Farm School and Junior Republic for Dependent Children.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 1103) permitting the withdrawal of water from White River, Ark., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 280) thereon.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2815) to reimburse certain Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation, Mont., for part or full value of an allotment of land to which they were individually entitled, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 281) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 3120) granting a pension to William L. Thomas (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3121) for the relief of F. A. McGregor; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3122) granting a pension to Sarah Purnell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 3123) granting a pension to Devonah Watts; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GREENE:

A bill (S. 3124) granting an increase of pension to Ethyl M. C. Horner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 3125) granting an increase of pension to Catherine Alter (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3126) granting an increase of pension to Pleasant Nidifer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 3127) to amend section 217 as amended of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

(By request.) A bill (S. 3128) to amend section 3 of the act approved April 12, 1926 (44 Stat. 239, 240), with reference to suits involving Indian land titles among the Five Civilized Tribes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 3129) for the relief of Frank N. Dominick; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 3130) to amend the act of March 3, 1915, by extending to the widows or dependents of naval officers and enlisted men who die and to enlisted men who are disabled as a result of submarine accidents the same pensions as are allowed in the case of aviation accidents; and

A bill (S. 3131) to provide additional pay for personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarines and to diving duty; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. DALE:

A bill (S. 3132) granting an increase of pension to Elmira M. Story (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 3133) to amend section 17 of the act approved June 10, 1922, entitled "An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," as amended; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 3134) granting a pension to Daisy Jinks; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Jinia F. King (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill insert the following:

Northwest: For the widening to 50 feet and repaving the roadway of H Street from Seventeenth Street to Eighteenth Street, $30,000. In the widening and repaving of the roadway of H Street between Seventeenth and Eighteenth Streets, 40 per cent of the entire cost thereof shall be assessed against and collected from the owners of abutting property in the manner provided in the act approved July 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L. 524), as amended by section 8 of the act approved September 1, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 716), and the owners of abutting property also shall be required to modify, at their own expense, the roofs of any vaults that may be under the sidewalk on said street if it be found necessary to change such vaults to permit of the roadway being widened.

ADMINISTRATION OF CIVIL SERVICE LAWS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a communication from the National Civil Service Reform League printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
8 West Fortieth Street, New York, February 4, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have read with interest your remarks, as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 31, in connection with the amendment proposed by Senator BRUCE to classify certain employees of the Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board under the civil service law.

The National Civil Service Reform League has been conscious for many years of the fact that certain provisions of the civil service law (the act of January 16, 1883) have been grossly abused by administrative officials. By far the most serious and the most extended abuse of the merit system in the Federal civil service occurs because of the latitude which is given to appointing authorities for the selection of one out of three on the eligible lists submitted by the Civil Service Commission. Under this provision of the rules, which, according to an opinion of the Attorney General, is made necessary under the Constitution (13 Op. Atty. Gen. 516, August 31, 1871), the spoils system is permitted to creep in with all its vicious results. The damage is most noticeable in the Postal Service, where the examinations are conducted in the field and where but one vacancy exists for each examination.

Since legislation to require the appointment of the person standing highest on eligible lists would be attacked on the ground of its questionable constitutionality, the league has endeavored for the past few years to obtain Executive orders which would in effect accomplish the same purpose as legislation in this regard. In connection with the Postal Service we have asked the Postmaster General to adopt a rule for his own guidance that in making selections from eligible lists for postmasterships and positions of rural carrier, he would take the person standing highest unless there were some exceptional reason why he should not, in which case he should make a written statement of the reason for the information of the President and the United States Civil Service Commission. This the Postmaster General refused to do. The only reason we were able to obtain from him for not doing so was that political pressure upon him was such that he could not do so.

We have carried our appeal to the President, asking that he by Executive order instruct the Postmaster General to adopt this policy with relation to appointments to postmasterships and positions of rural carrier. This the President has so far been unwilling to do.

The bad effect of the policy of the selection of one out of three is due to the present practice of the Post Office Department of submitting the eligible list to the Member of Congress or to the local political leader in the district in which the vacancy has occurred. He is asked to recommend the person he considers best fitted "as to character or residence." As you well know, section 10 of the civil service law restricts the recommendations that may be received by appointing officers from Members of Congress to the question of character or residence of the candidate. However, it is well known and, indeed, it is only natural that the judgment of a Member of Congress as to the character of a candidate is in most cases controlled by the political opinions and affiliations of the candidate. Section 10 of the civil service law was intended to prevent the very things that by the present practices of the Post Office Department are permitted under it.

The league would be glad to have your opinion as to the best means of correcting this situation. For example, would you agree to a provision in the law which would prohibit heads of departments from seeking or receiving recommendations from the Members of Congress or from local political leaders as to the selection of one of the three persons on eligible lists for postmasterships or positions of rural carrier?

I inclose a marked copy of proceedings of the last annual meeting of the league, in which this subject is discussed in the annual report of our council.

Sincerely yours,

H. W. MARSH, Secretary.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter from Congressman JOHN C. BOX, of Texas, on the subject of the proposed quota for Mexican immigration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1928.

Mr. WILLIAM C. HALL,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce, Lufkin, Tex.

MY DEAR MR. HALL: I am just in receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo, in which you say:

Hon. JOHN C. BOX,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOX: This is to inform you that at a recent meeting of the board of directors of the Lufkin Chamber of Commerce, in which we had a large attendance, the matter of restricting Mexican immigration, which is brought into Texas for the purpose of furnishing the necessary labor to carry on the general farming operations, especially along the southern line of Texas, also to assist in railroad work and general development work in the timber country, which is so necessary to the upbuilding of our great State.

Our directors were unanimous in their opinion that it was a mistake to restrict this immigration, and that they are joined by a majority of our people in this opinion. They desire to inform you that this matter of restriction is in opposition to the best thought of our local people, and they strongly protest the action you have taken in regard to this matter. It is hoped that you will reconsider your action regarding the immigration matter and aid in continuing the present arrangement for the use of this class of labor in Texas.

This letter is being sent to each of the Congressmen of the State, also to the various district chamber of commerce organizations.

Yours very truly,

WM. C. HALL, Secretary.

I believe that I know more about the bearing of this question upon the welfare of all of the people now and hereafter than any man or group looking upon it from the standpoint of personal and local immediate financial interest.

The bulk of these Mexican peons do not return to Mexico, as is often incorrectly stated. The number of alien-born Mexicans in Texas and throughout the country is increasing rapidly. Their numbers more than doubled between 1900 and 1910, and more than doubled again between 1910 and 1920, and probably have more than doubled again since 1920. Some estimate our present alien Mexican population at 3,000,000. An official estimate made some time ago placed it at more than 1,000,000. I estimate it at some 2,000,000.

Every reason which calls for the restriction of undesirable immigrants from other countries calls for restriction against these peons. They are illiterate and many of them suffer from contagious diseases which they spread. They furnish a disproportionately large number of paupers and criminals. Where they are numerous many of them vote, and they are becoming numerous in many places. Under bad leadership their ignorance and degradation often debauches the ballot shamefully.

They are displacing thousands of American-born men and women in our industries and turn our own people adrift in search of honest employment, sometimes into vagrancy. American farmers are now producing a surplus of staple products which bears down ruinously the prices of farm products at home and abroad. More Mexican peons working for absentee landlords add to the distress of this situation. In rural communities they supplant Americans and correspondingly weaken country schools, churches, and all good community life. The admission of many thousands of them annually tends to drive our rural population further down toward pauper peasantry.

Human experience, as it has passed through successive generations, has been filled with the record of such blunders as you would have me make now and the woes which have resulted. Thoughtful men do not laugh at the lessons taught by history, which is the record of human experience. You urge the very reasons which were urged in support of the bringing of black slave labor to America. That resulted in years of strife, war, and ruin, the loss of hundreds of thousands of the finest lives, bitter sectionalism in the Nation for half a century, and still leaves a troublesome, ominous race question. Large sections of the country have already been so filled with similar people from southern and eastern Europe that their American minorities are alarmed and the rest of the country disturbed. This movement into Texas, California, and the Southwest is like it in character and in the dangers attending it. Race troubles have already occurred between Mexicans and Americans in several places in Texas, Colorado, and elsewhere. That Mexican and American people and ideas and practices do not blend harmoniously was proven in Texas 90 years ago. The Alamo, Goliad, and many other horrors resulted. You are asking me to remix some things my grandfather helped to unscramble at San Jacinto.

Gentlemen, I am a public servant, grateful for the confidence and kindness shown me by my constituents, and anxious to have your approval, but bound to make the public welfare paramount. If my knowledge, judgment, and sense of duty deprive me of your approval, I shall regret it. If a majority of the people of Angelina County and the district agree with you in demanding a reversal of my course and can find a man who will be more complacent and forgetful of other obligations upon him, or who agrees with you and is frank and courageous enough to publicly so declare himself, the course to be pursued by your Representative, after my present service terminates, can be settled in the good American way. I am a candidate for reelection and shall go forward in the course I indicated from the beginning and am consistently following.

In all matters wherein I can serve you, your directors, and membership consistently with the paramount obligations resting upon me, I remain,

Your servant,

JOHN C. BOX.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of February 8, 1928, entitled "Justice to disabled emergency officers."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUSTICE TO DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

The bill for the relief of disabled emergency officers of the Army has twice passed the Senate. Recently it was reported to the House of Representatives with only one vote in the negative. There seems to be no reason why it should not be taken up and put on passage. Why the delay? Such legislation would be an act of justice to meritorious officers who led American troops in France and who are 30 per cent or more disabled. Regular Army officers in the same condition have been retired and are receiving 75 per cent of the pay of their rank. In a report on the bill made on January 23, Senator TYSON said:

"There were nine classes of officers who fought in the World War. These were the Regular, provisional, and emergency officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Eight of these nine classes of officers have been retired by the Congress for wounds and disabilities resulting from their World War services. The only officers for whom the Congress has failed to provide retirement are the disabled emergency Army officers."

The selective service act of May, 1917, put all officers and men not of the Regular Army on the same footing as regards pay, allowances, and pensions with officers and men of the Regular Army. There should be no discrimination against the emergency officers. But for almost eight years there has been a discrimination. Why should a Regular Army officer, retired for wounds and physical disability, receive a substantial pension and the emergency officer be deprived of it? Senator TYSON brought out the fact that 93 per cent of the Army officers killed in action were emergency officers. To-day their average age is 48 years. The battle deaths of the emergency officers were 54 per cent greater than those of the men who served under them.

It is not true, as asserted, that enlisted men are opposed to the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill. Ninety per cent of the members of the American Legion served in the ranks, and ten times the Legion has approved the principle of the proposed legislation. Seven times have the Disabled American Veterans recorded their commendation. "The disabled emergency enlisted man," says Senator TYSON, "realizes that the compensation now drawn by him is more than he would draw if this act were made applicable to him." With slight criticism of the wording of the bill, which did not affect the principle of it, Secretary of War Davis gave his sanction to it on January 21 in a letter to Chairman REED, of the Senate Military Affairs Committee. Mr. Davis, however, said that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget had advised him that "the proposed legislation" was "in conflict with the financial program of the President." But does anyone think that Mr. Coolidge would veto this bill if it were sent to him by Congress? The country does not want money saved at the expense of the gallant emergency officers of the World War. The obstructionists should stand aside and let the House vote.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT MADISON, IND.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, some days ago the Senate passed a Senate bill to construct a bridge at Madison, Ind. The House has passed a similar bill, being House bill 7916, which has come over to the Senate and been referred to the Committee on Commerce. I move that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from further consideration of the bill and that it may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Committee on Commerce will be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7916) authorizing the Madison Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Madison, Jefferson County, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator if the House bill is identical with the Senate bill which the Senator says has been passed?

Mr. WATSON. My understanding is that they are identical.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the bills are identical.

Mr. JONES. If the bills are identical, I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT PRINTING CLERK

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a day or two ago there was reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution submitted by me providing for the employment of an additional clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate. I ask, out of order, unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of that resolution.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator the reason for that? We have had more business at other sessions of the Senate than at this.

Mr. WATSON. There are several employees in the office of the Secretary who are not well. Of course, they are on the roll. The Secretary now has one employee in his office who is sick and can not perform the duties required. There is absolute necessity for it or I would not have offered the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 140) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to employ an assistant printing clerk from February 1, 1928, for service in the office of the Secretary at the rate of $1,940 per annum to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until the end of the present session of Congress.

RECORDS OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution on the calendar which involves the printing of a document. It should not have gone to the calendar in the first place. I refer to Senate Resolution 134, which has been reported by the Committee on Printing and which proposes to print the manuscript entitled "Records of the Conference for the Limitation of Naval Armaments held at Geneva from June 20 to August 4, 1927." There is necessity for the immediate printing of the document, as there are no copies available.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand the Senator to say that the resolution has been reported from the Committee on Printing?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 134) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Records of the Conference for the Limitation of Naval Armament held at Geneva from June 20 to August 4, 1927," be printed as a Senate document.

MENOMINEE RIVER BRIDGE AT MARINETTE, WIS.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2902) granting the consent of Congress to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Menominee River at or near Marinette, Wis.

Mr. KING. I will inquire of the Senator if the report on the bill is unanimous?

Mr. BLAINE. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 1, on page 1, line 6, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Wisconsin and the State of Michigan to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Menominee River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Marinette, Wis., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the State of Wisconsin and the State of Michigan all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), in pursuance of the order previously entered, adjourned until Monday, February 13, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, February 10, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed, blessed Heavenly Father, Thou hast called us to a great task. We would prepare ourselves at Thy altar, and there exercise the greatest and the humblest virtue, which is penitence. May our greatest victories be wrought in our own hearts. Let the thought of God become increasingly precious to us. Open Thou our eyes that may behold wondrous things out of Thy law. Show us the wealth that lies beneath the old familiar Word. O teach us over again the glory of that treasure that lies hidden in the songs of Zion, and raise us up to that height of aspiration which was the summit of the prophets of old. Make these hours golden by revealing unto us Thy wisdom. But, above all, make us men after God's own heart—which is, make us just, loving, generous, and magnanimous. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 473. An act authorizing the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.; and

H. R. 7902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. Con. Res. 10. Concurrent resolution requesting certain information from the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to regulation of freight rates with a view to equalizing prosperity among producers of commodities;

S. 1478. An act to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a road on the Lummi Indian Reservation, Wash.; and

S. 2656. An act to establish a minimum area for a Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A concurrent resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table, and, under the rule, referred to the appropriate committee, as follows:

S. Con. Res. 10. Concurrent resolution requesting certain information from the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to regulation of freight rates with a view to equalizing prosperity among producers of commodities; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 473. An act authorizing the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.;

H. R. 7013. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928;

H. R. 7902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.; and

H. R. 8269. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

SEATS ON FLOOR OF SENATE AND HOUSE FOR CABINET OFFICERS—REFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the bill H. R. 5625, introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], providing that the heads of executive departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and the House of Representatives, which bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. My object in calling it to the attention of the Speaker at this time is because I believe the bill should have been properly referred to the Committee on Rules, as the bill deals entirely with the rules of the Senate and the House. Rule XXXIII of the House, for instance, provides who shall be admitted to the floor of the House, and Rule XII defines the rights of people such as Delegates who are not Members of the House. I think there is no doubt that the bill should have been properly referred to the Committee on Rules, but it is not my desire or intent to ask that it be rereferred. I merely want to protect the rights of the Committee on Rules in regard to any future bills of this character.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman does not make the objection now as to the jurisdiction of the committee to which this bill was referred, he would be too late to make it when that committee reported the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to make any objection, as far as this bill is concerned. I merely rise to call the attention of the Speaker to the situation, and to suggest that in the future such bills be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this bill give the right of debate to Cabinet officers?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I should not think they would want that, although we might like to have some of them here so that we could interrogate them on things they do not know anything about.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand from the gentleman from New York that he thinks as a matter of procedure this bill should have the reference he has just indicated, but that, as the lawyers say, he only makes the point for future reference.

Mr. SNELL. That is all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He does not ask for a rereference of the bill?

Mr. SNELL. I do not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say that is satisfactory to me, although I indicated no preference for a reference of this bill originally. I think the bill has been to two committees and is now before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If it be the rule that this bill should properly go to the Committee on Rules, and the chairman of that committee not seeing fit to demand his jurisdiction, is not that a matter that any Member of the House can exercise a prerogative in respect to and ask that the rule be enforced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would recognize any gentleman under the circumstances to ask unanimous consent for a rereference, but the Chair thinks that the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction over a matter of this sort. However, now that the attention of the Chair has been called to the matter, he does not hesitate to say that the Chair thinks that a more proper reference would have been to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to get a ruling by the Chair, as I am against that bill, and being a little afraid that the influence of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] might be so strong that the Committee on the Judiciary will favorably report it when probably it would not be so reported from the Committee on Rules——

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would not make the request at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order in order to get the matter before the Speaker.

Mr. SNELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold it for the present. I think the matter will work out satisfactorily later.

Mr. BLANTON. But after the Committee on the Judiciary reports the bill the gentleman from New York will have lost his rights in the matter.

Mr. SNELL. But they have not reported it as yet.

Mr. BLANTON. But they might report it.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly; they could report anything that was before them.

Mr. BLANTON. In order to get a ruling by the Chair, I make the point of order that that bill is improperly before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not sustain that point of order. The Chair thinks that the Committee on the Judiciary would have jurisdiction, but the Chair is clear that the reference would be more properly to the Committee on Rules. In default of any action by the Committee on Rules, the Chair thinks the bill had better remain where it is.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Washington will fix a time limit when this committee may do that, and not have it during the entire Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am willing to modify my request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For 30 days.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. About that. Give us the month of March.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have asked the gentleman, who is chairman of the Committee on Immigration, to limit it to 30 days.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request and ask that the committee may sit during the sessions of the House for 30 days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House for the next 30 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes right now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, during recent days I have heard many Members of the House speaking almost tearfully about the great losses sustained by their home people through the unfortunate failure of banks, and I have read of large sums of money being carried even by airplanes to bolster up tottering banks. At this moment I desire to explain to all of them an easy way to get rid of all such apprehensions on their part and of all such losses on the part of their constituents.

There is now pending before this House a bill known as H. R. 5576, which provides a law to guarantee the deposits of the people in national banks along the line of the deposit law with reference to State banks in Nebraska, under the administration of which law in 17 years no person has ever lost a dollar.

Now, I want to get this bill passed if I can, but in the meantime I suggest to all my colleagues the advisability of suggesting to their home folks that they should send their deposits to Nebraska, where the bank deposits are guaranteed and where no person has lost or can lose a dollar. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Can the gentleman tell us who introduced the bill he refers to?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. An eminent member of our State delegation introduced the bill, but a feeling of modesty prevents me from announcing his identity. [Laughter.]

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of February, in the year 1800, following the death of General Washington in December of the previous year, the anniversary of his birth was celebrated in Alexandria city, and that has been the custom ever since.

On the coming February 22, which falls on Wednesday, there will be such a celebration, marked by more than usually impressive ceremonies. One of the incidents will be a reception by the Governor of Virginia and Mrs. Byrd of the President of the United States and the other guests who may honor the occasion by their presence. I am requested by the George Washington Birthday Association, a very old association, which was organized about 30 days after the death of Washington, to invite the Members and officers of the House and their wives to attend the approaching celebration. Those of them who find it possible to do so will be most heartily welcomed by the community which was the county seat of Washington's county of Fairfax for most of his active life, which was, as we would now say, his home town, and with which he was more closely and constantly identified than with any other locality. In no other locality are there such vivid and unfading memories of the wonderful soldier and statesman who is everywhere venerated as the master builder of our great Republic. I have no doubt that Governor Byrd, of Virginia, will communicate individually with the Members of the House. [Applause.]

NAVAL AIRCRAFT POLICY

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there appeared in the evening papers of yesterday and the morning papers a news item which quotes Admiral Philip Andrews, of Boston, Mass., as making a statement evidently for the purpose of discrediting Colonel Lindbergh's successful flights. This admiral makes the statement that such flights were 95 to 98 per cent luck. It would seem to the casual observer, and I view it in this manner, as an underhanded rap at Colonel Lindbergh and aviation. This admiral tried to discredit the ability of one of the greatest flyers that the world has ever produced. [Applause.]

Admiral Andrews, in making his unwarranted criticism, does not take into consideration the fact that this flyer has been making daily trips in the air for the past six or seven months, in all kinds of weather, and, in addition, making landings at places where airplanes have never flown before. Colonel Lindbergh has used only one machine in a series of flights—in addition to crossing the ocean—which carried him into every State in the Union, and the remarkable fact about the longest tour ever made in the United States was that the "Lone Eagle of the Air" always arrived at his destination on time. Everyone remembers that a short while ago Colonel Lindbergh flew from Washington to Old Mexico, and after visiting there a few days he began a tour of certain South American countries, which brought him into contact with some of the most difficult obstacles that have ever been faced by any aviator, and I believe I am safe in saying that he arrived on time at every place with the exception of one, where he was delayed on account of fogs. I suppose that this learned admiral would say that these additional flights were 98 per cent luck. It is not luck, but, on the other hand, pluck and the ability to know how to navigate the air.

I would like to know who is it that is sponsoring certain admirals to come out in newspaper articles and throw rocks in the way of criticism at those who are trying to build up not only aviation but in addition the finest international feeling that was ever promoted by any ambassador of this Nation or otherwise. This particular naval officer is not satisfied with taking a fling at Lindbergh and aviation, but in addition he makes certain statements which leave the impression that our two new airplane carriers, costing more than $80,000,000, will not be successful. Everyone that has kept up with the progress of aviation now knows that there are in the Navy some officers who have done everything in their power not only to discredit aviation but to leave the impression with the public that certain types of ships are more important than this branch of national defense.

During the hearings now being held before the Naval Affairs Committee testimony has been given showing that airplane carriers will be able to combat an enemy with bombing planes for a distance of 200 miles before an attacking ship can get within gun range. If this is true, and it has not been denied, then the most dangerous citizen in the Nation is that class of individuals who are so prejudiced against new, up-to-date appliances of defense as to try to poison the minds of the public in favor of the kind of ships that are now thought by many to be obsolete. I have no patience with any kind of a superannuated officer—be he in the Navy or the Army—who has a mind that can not accept new ideas, and the quicker this Nation can retire such individuals from the service the better off we will be. I believe that the people are getting tired of reading in the papers every two or three days about some admiral in the Navy trying to discredit some person, some branch of the service, or predicting war with some major nation, all for the purpose of stimulating sentiment in favor of the greatest shipbuilding program in all the world.

I think the country would like the Secretary of the Navy to answer this question: Who is inspiring these admirals to go out whenever an occasion presents itself for the purpose of developing sentiment in favor of this great shipbuilding naval policy? It will be remembered that Admiral Magruder made a suggestion relative to economy in the Navy, and off came his head; but when these other admirals come out for the purpose of molding public sentiment and trying to discredit aircraft and all those connected with it, and the Secretary of the Navy does not act, I feel there is something radically wrong here in Washington, and I think that any admiral who would try to discredit Lindbergh, who has done more for this Nation than any other unofficial representative we have ever had, ought to be dealt with in a way so that we will have no more disgraceful, uncalled-for outbursts. [Applause.]

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 278, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 278, which the Clerk will report.

The conference report and accompanying statements were read.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
FRITZ G. LANHAM,
J. WILL TAYLOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

HENRY W. KEYES,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1: Makes the amount of annual expenditures of $35,000,000 available, "beginning with the fiscal year 1928."

On amendment No. 2: Provides that expenditures outside of the District of Columbia under the provisions of section 5 of the public building act of May 25, 1926, shall not exceed $10,000,000 annually (in lieu of $5,000,000) in any one of the States, Territories, or possessions of the United States.

RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
FRITZ G. LANHAM,
J. WILL TAYLOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, line 4, after the word "training," strike out the sign and figures "$2,125,600" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$2,657,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 268, nays 95, not voting 70, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SPEAKS: Page 64, after the comma, in line 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the conduct of the national matches and the maintenance and operation of the Small Arms Firing School held in conjunction therewith as authorized by section 113 (c) of the national defense act (act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 7, 1924, and February 14, 1927), including procurement and installation of equipment, ammunition, supplies, materials, flooring and frames for tents, construction of shooting galleries, and shelters for rifle practice; nonstructural improvements; repairs and alterations to buildings, water system, sewer and lighting systems; repairs and alterations to equipment and supplies; communication service; pay and allowance of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard participating in the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School from the date of departure from their home to the date of return thereto; pay and allowance of reserve officers called to active duty in connection with the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School; personal and nonpersonal services; subsistence, including commutation of rations to authorized teams from the National Guard, Organized Reserve, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and civilian teams representing the States, and including the enlisted men of teams from the Regular Army, from the date of departure from their homes or stations to the date of return thereto, at the rate not exceeding $1.50 per day each; transportation, including repair, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled and animal-drawn vehicles; travel of authorized teams representing the Regular Army, National Guard, Organized Reserve, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and civilian teams representing States, including officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; travel of commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Regular Army, National Guard, and Organized Reserve on duty in connection with the national matches and the Small Arms Firing School, including mileage of officers; reimbursement of travel expenses or allowance in lieu thereof as authorized by law for officers of the Regular Army and Organized Reserve; travel of civilian employees to and from the national matches, including a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence while traveling to and from said matches and while on duty thereat; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $500,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: On page 79, line 10, strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$55,886,310."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARBOUR) there were—ayes 160, noes 96.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is a member of the committee?

Mr. COLLINS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi to offer a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COLLINS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to forthwith report the same back to the House with the following amendment:

"Add to the end of the bill the following as a section:

"Without authorization by Congress no part of the funds appropriated by this act shall be expended in the transportation of any portion of the armed forces provided for in this act to the territory of a foreign country over which the United States does not possess jurisdiction."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to recommit the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 229, not voting 79, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, a motion to reconsider the bill was laid on the table.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state for the benefit of the House that very shortly we will have the pleasure of receiving in the gallery two distinguished French aviators, Lieut. Commander Joseph Lebrix and Lieut. Dieudonné Costes. The Chair is sure this will be a matter of interest and that the Members will desire to be present. They are expected some time between 2 and half past 2 o'clock.

SHENANDOAH NATIONAL PARK

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2656) to establish a minimum area for a Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes, and pass the same. A similar House bill (H. R. 8526) has been unanimously reported by the committee and is on the calendar.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill reported?

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the tariff.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to that request. If the gentleman wants time, I will yield him time in general debate.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman can secure time, as we expect to have general debate going on at that time.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY 30 PATRIOTIC ORGANIZATIONS OF WOMEN

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have another unanimous-consent request to submit. Last week there was a meeting of 30 patriotic organizations of women, such as the American Legion Auxiliary and the Daughters of the Revolution, who had a meeting in Washington and passed a short set of resolutions. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting these resolutions in the Appendix.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks I insert in the RECORD the following resolutions adopted by 30 patriotic organizations of women who met in the city of Washington February 1 to 3, 1928. This conference, which these women's national patriotic groups hold in the interest of national defense, is an annual affair. They have formed a permanent organization, known as

RESOLUTION ADOPTED

Whereas activities, movements, campaigns, and crusades are being organized under the specious titles of—

"Remedy of war,"

"Making the ballot count,"

"Promoting international righteousness,"

"Rebuilding the postwar world,"

"Stimulating the socialistic theory of 'production for use and not for profit,'"

"Young Pioneers":

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the organizations represented in the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense urge their members for their own protection to rigidly examine the aims and objectives of all such activities before aligning themselves in tangible or intangible support thereof and that they question themselves in the following manner:

Where are we being led?

Who leads us?

Do we investigate an organization before joining it?

Do we contribute to causes without examining their motives?

Do we lend our names as patronesses without ascertaining ways in which they are to be used?

Do we grant the use of our homes to so-called liberals for "betterment meetings," "international programs," "fellowship discussions," and the like?

Do we entertain "emissaries of radicalism" unawares?

Do we sign petitions calling for action by governmental authorities without finding out whether such action may be considered as undue "meddling" with the management of governmental affairs?

Do we deluge our Senators and Representatives with telegrams and letters at the request of so-called peace movements?

What type of resolutions are our communities passing? What organizations quote and make use of these resolutions to influence public opinion?

How much study do we give to national defense?

Do we give sufficient thought and study to legislative measures before indorsing them?

Do we vote?

Do we urge the conservative and apathetic people of our community to vote?

Who teaches our children?

What are they taught?

Where do they spend their leisure hours?

What organizations attempt to recruit them?

Do they take student tours, attend summer conferences and camps, and travel in youth caravans? If so, under what guidance and escort?

What view do they take of marriage? Of religion?

ADEQUATE NAVY REQUESTED

Whereas the United States Navy has been the pride of the American people and the handmaiden of American liberty throughout our history, and valiantly performed its duty of keeping our shores free from invasion; and

Whereas the safety of this Nation depends primarily upon our first line of defense, the United States Navy, to protect our shores and keep off all comers with hostile or avaricious intent; and

Whereas it is the duty of every American citizen to see that the United States Navy is prepared for this great missison in an adequate manner and manned by a personnel of officers and men worthy of the traditions established by John Paul Jones, Lawrence, Porter, Farragut, Decatur, and Dewey, pledged to devotion to duty and the commission of valorous deeds; and

Whereas the safety of the Nation and of these brave men and lads in Navy blue depends on the building of real ships of the most modern type, not only as preparation for national defense but as peace insurance: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Third Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, assembled in Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, D. C., this day, February 3, 1928, put itself on record as standing firmly in favor of an adequate Navy and merchant marine for the United States of America, inferior to none, and in keeping with the population, wealth, and resources of this Nation, so that in case of aggression we will be able to not only defend our shores and homes but to maintain those high principles of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" for each individual, established by the founders of this Republic; and

Resolved, That we indorse the pending Navy program in Congress, including the building of 5 airplane carriers, 25 cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, and 35 submarines, and the naval aviation building program sufficient to equip these vessels adequately and the immediate construction of the 2 rigid airships for the Navy already authorized by Congress.

THE WOMAN'S NAVAL SERVICE,
Mrs. GEORGE BARNETT.
Mrs. GIBSON FAHNESTOCK.
Mrs. JAMES M. THOMSON.
Miss NATALIE SUMNER LINCOLN.
Mrs. VYLLA POE WILSON.
Miss ELISABETH E. POE.

MERCHANT MARINE UPHELD

Whereas the merchant marine of the United States is an integral part of the Navy calculations during wars; and

Whereas it is necessary for the national defense that the United States possess a large and prosperous merchant marine to serve as an auxiliary of the Navy in time of peril; and

Whereas this can best be accomplished by building up our merchant shipping in time of peace, carefully seeing to it that American foreign commerce is transported in ships owned and manned by American citizens and flying the American flag, to the end that in time of emergency we shall be able, promptly and effectually, to uphold our rights upon the seas: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, in session at Washington, D. C., this 3d day of February, 1928, places itself on record as strongly favoring the permanent maintenance of adequate American steamship service on routes essential to American trade; that it believes this is for the interest of the people of the United States, and urges Congress, in furtherance of the national desire to promote and foster an American merchant marine, to continue its moral and material support of the laudable work of the United States Shipping Board in keeping the American flag upon the seas.

No. 4

GET OUT THE VOTE

Whereas many invidious schemes for "political education" are likely to be initiated during the coming election season, such as subtle propaganda by radio to discredit American principles or no less cleverly designed though more openly practiced agitation to influence the woman's vote: Therefore be it

Resolved, That every member of every organization represented at the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense be urged to counteract any such propaganda by renewing her allegiance to national ideals, by refreshing her knowledge of the United States Constitution, and by pledging herself not only to vote constructively but to help get out the conservative vote of the Nation.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 5

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION APPROVED

Whereas the immigration act of 1924, passed by an overwhelming vote in both Houses of Congress in response to the nation-wide demand of the American people, was a well-considered and statesmanlike measure for restricting immigration to the United States, and provided a fair basis for apportioning the immigration still permitted in accordance with the present composition of the American people; and

Whereas the total annual immigration legally admitted to the United States, now about 450,000, without counting the great illegal immigration, remains far too large; and

Whereas it is generally conceded that quota restrictions should be extended to Mexico, the West Indies, and the countries of Central and South America, from which we are receiving a large unassimilable immigration detrimental to American labor; and

Whereas the illegal entries of aliens over our land borders and into our seaports are continuing on a large scale, there is need of much larger appropriations by Congress to check this evil and also to deport the thousands of alien criminals and others already now in the country who are subject to deportation under our laws: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, representing 30 patriotic organizations, assembled in Continental Memorial Hall, at Washington, D. C., on this 3d day of February, 1928, That we urge upon Congress the continuance of the basic provisions of the immigration act of 1924, including the national-origins system, as the permanent basis for apportioning the quotas; the extension of quota restrictions to Mexico, the West Indies, and the countries of Central and South America; the decrease of the total quota immigration in accordance with the principle of national origins; the enactment of more strict legislation, supported by adequate appropriations, to effect the deportation of aliens who have surreptitiously entered the country, or who have succeeded in evading our laws designed to exclude the dangerously criminal and insane; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the chairman of the House Immigration Committee.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 6

OLD IRONSIDES FUND

Whereas the aid of fraternal and patriotic organizations throughout the country has been asked in promoting the campaign to save the U. S. S. Constitution, familiarly known as Old Ironsides: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense individually, so far as possible, assist in this work by helping in the sale of the prints of a painting of the ship by Gordon Grant, or by personal contributions to the $750,000 fund needed for the saving of this ship—Old Ironsides—remembered for its great historical and patriotic significance.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 7

INCREASE THE RESERVES

Whereas we recall that President Coolidge in an annual address said that "Our country reports nothing but peaceful intentions toward all the earth, but it ought not to fail to maintain such a military force as comports with the dignity and security of a great people. It should be a balanced force, intensely modern, capable of defense by land and sea, beneath the surface and in the air." And that further word of his is embodied in an annual message that "For several years we have been decreasing the personnel of the Army and Navy, and reducing their power to the danger point. Further reduction should not be made. The Army is a guaranty of the security of our citizens at home"; and

Whereas reliance by the American people upon the national defense act as a safe defense policy is justified only so far as that policy is carried into effect; and

Whereas the Chief of Staff of the United States Army estimates that 220,000 reserve officers are needed to function the six-field-Army mobilization plan of the War Department; and

Whereas at this time there are but about 110,000 reserve officers; and

Whereas there are only about 16,000 of these reserve officers trained annually: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense indorse the plan contemplated by the national defense act of having trained in peace time a sufficient number of reserve officers to train and command a draft Army on the basis of the War Department's present mobilization plans of six field armies in the event of national emergency.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 8

R. O. T. C. AND C. M. T. C.

Whereas the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense recognizes and appreciates the patriotic service of the National Guard of the various States; Therefore be it

Resolved, That we express to them our sense of security resulting from their traditional and continued protection of our homes and cherished institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That we uphold the training of our youth in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and in the citizens' military training camps as giving to the Nation the highest exemplification of strong American manhood.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 9

DISABLED EMERGENCY ARMY OFFICERS

Whereas of the nine classes of officers who fought the World War eight have been granted retirement by the Congress, although the ninth, the disabled emergency Army officers, which suffered the greatest battle casualties and severest wounds and disabilities, has not yet been granted this retirement; and

Whereas the Tyson-Fitzgerald bills to make such retirement effective are now pending in the Senate and the House: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Third Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense earnestly requests the Congress to enact this just legislation at the present session of Congress.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 10

MILITARY AVIATION

Whereas the five-year Army air program, provided under the act of July 2, 1926, provided for an annual increment of 1,248 enlisted men, in addition to increased officer personnel; and

Whereas in neither enlisted nor officer strength have the provisions of this act been maintained; and

Whereas this conference believes that the relative importance of the air force is increasing rather than decreasing: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress and the War Department be requested to find ways and means of rectifying this situation; and be it further

Resolved, That this Third Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense looks with favor upon the creation of an adequate air force at such time in the future as this may be expedient.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 11

UNIVERSAL DRAFT

Whereas the Capper-Johnson bill to provide the universal draft in the event of war has now been repeatedly introduced during the last five years; and

Whereas this legislation is first of all a peace measure, in that it would make war less likely to occur; it is a national defense measure, in that all elements of the Nation would serve without profit in the event of war; it is a measure of simple justice, as it would tend to eliminate slackers and profiteers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Third Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, urge the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House to report these measures favorably to their respective bodies, so that in the event of another war there may be equal service by all and special privilege for none, and profit be definitely taken out of war.

No. 12

HOSTESSES

Whereas the Army hostess service maintained by civilian organizations during the World War, taken over from them and supported by the Army since that time, has proved to be not only a very important factor in providing for the contentment, well-being, and general welfare of the enlisted men in the Army and their families, and also in promoting a closer cooperation between the civilian communities and the Army posts where hostesses are employed in recreational and other activities; and

Whereas this service has very seriously diminished since it has been dependent upon Government money instead of funds provided by civilian organizations; and

Whereas we believe such welfare work is even more necessary to the soldiers and their families than it is to employees of large civilian organizations, owing to the isolated conditions of a soldier's life; and

Whereas we believe that one or more hostesses should be at every summer camp where young boys are being trained, and where they are often away from home for the first time: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense now in conference assembled does unqualifiedly indorse this valuable service and urge the Secretary of War to give these hostesses a permanent military status, and to increase the number so that every important post and every summer training camp shall have at least one trained Army hostess; and be it further

Resolved, That this conference urge its members to request their Representatives and Senators in Congress to work for a congressional appropriation of not less than $75,000 for this service.

No. 13

CHEMICAL

Whereas the surprise attack on the allied armies, April 22, 1915, with chemical-warfare materials very nearly resulted in complete disaster for the allied cause; and

Whereas unpreparedness in any powerful means of waging war is an invitation to attack and surprise by that method; and chemical warfare demonstrated in the World War its very great power: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, That it reaffirm the action taken in 1927 in urging the continued full support of the Chemical Warfare Service and in deploring all attempts to destroy that valuable part of our national defense, the necessity for which was so fully recognized during the World War.

No. 14

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER

Whereas the Star-Spangled Banner, words by Francis Scott Key and music by John Stafford Smith, has been declared the national anthem by the regulations of the Army and Navy for the past 100 years, and has been enshrined as such in the hearts of the American people: Be it

Resolved, That this Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, consisting of 30 national patriotic organizations, do petition the Congress of the United States of America to establish the Star-Spangled Banner as the national anthem of this country by passing bill H. R. 206.

No. 15

SCHOOL TEXTBOOKS ON AMERICAN HISTORY

Whereas attempts are being made to expunge from our school histories all references to war and heroism in battle; to ignore the honor due to the great soldiers and sailors of the Nation; to stress internationalism in place of national loyalties; to belittle those who have fought and died that this Nation might live; and to exalt at their expense the so-called "heroes of peace"; and

Whereas we feel that the truths of history, both military and civil, should never be thus tampered with in order to advance the interests or opinions of any section of our people; and

Whereas we feel that love of our own country, respect for its laws and institutions, and reverence for its heroes of peace and war should be instilled into the minds of our youth, but without arousing bitterness against any other country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we disapprove all such attempts to falsify our history, and that we recommend to each organization comprising this Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense that it appoint a committee to make rigid investigation into conditions in the schools relative to the teaching of American history and the books in use.

Resolved, That we request the members of this conference to urge a law in their respective States requiring all teachers in public and private schools to take the oath of allegiance to the United States of America.

No. 16

SOVIET RUSSIA

Whereas the plan promulgated in the constitution and decrees of the present Soviet Government of Russia for a world revolution to destroy all existing "capitalist governments" and do away with the hated "bourgeoise class" through "red revolution" is not a myth but a proven fact; and

Whereas the emissaries are working unceasingly to spread their propaganda for "peace" through abolition of military training and total disarming of all capitalist nations, including the United States, destruction of courts, fostering discredit of the officials and institutions of our Government, particularly its foreign policy; and

Whereas a campaign is well on its way with paid organizers to mobilize children into "young communist groups," into the "youth movement," into "young communist leagues," "young pioneers," etc., to organize communist group units within the United States military units, to establish industrial "nuclei" in every industry—railways, mills, factories, munition plants—capable and ready to take command and defeat the United States mobilization plans when their revolution is ripe, or when capitalist nations are disarmed; and

Whereas units of the Communist (International) Party in America are increasing at a tremendous rate, sweeping thousands of unsuspecting "pacifists" into unwitting (or knowing) cooperate with their program, disguised as "peace plans" and loudly proclaiming for recognition of Soviet Russia in order that their uncensored folio may come in under "diplomatic immunity to search," whereby propaganda centers could be set up in the consulate of every American city to great advantage of the present soviet régime; and

Whereas there is no way of knowing where the "boundaries" of this so-called soviet nation are (inasmuch as they are as wide as the territory occupied by the "proletariat" or laboring class), any one of the republics of the federation having a right under their constitution to decree itself out of the union when it wishes to escape an international obligation:

Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense go on record as opposing the recognition of Soviet Russia by the Government of the United States; and further be it

Resolved, That the representatives of the various organizations participating in the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense here convened send out a rousing call to their respective groups to organize a definite campaign to counteract activities and influences of menacing forces now within our gates and to prevent others entering; and be it further

Resolved, That all the organizations here represented be urged to establish substantial funds for the use of their respective committees intrusted with the vitally important task of cooperation for national defense against such well organized and well financed enemies.

No. 17

FLAG CODE

Whereas the red, white, and blue of the flag enfolds the very spirit and vitality of our Republic; and

Whereas age has been taught to revere "Old Glory"; and

Whereas youth should look upon it as worthy of supreme devotion and repudiate all attempted substitutes of green esperanto flags, peace flags, and red flags: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense go on record as indorsing House Joint Resolution 11, to adopt an official flag code of the United States.

No. 18

THE CONSTITUTION UPHELD

Whereas we, the members of the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, wish to place ourselves on record as firm supporters of the Constitution of the United States, acknowledging it to be the greatest safeguard of human liberty ever given to mankind; and

Whereas we pledge ourselves, individually and collectively, to defend and uphold the Constitution by rendering loyalty to its sentiments, obedience to its provisions, and by holding its principles sacred and inviolable: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge the people of the United States to guard against the substitution of bureaucracy for democracy, paternalism for individual and community responsibility, centralized authority for local self-government, which substitution would undermine American principles of government ordained and established by the Constitution of the United States.

FEBRUARY 3, 1928.

No. 19

TEACH THE CONSTITUTION

Whereas knowledge and understanding of our system of government is the greatest safeguard of our institutions; and

Whereas there are eight remaining States whose legislatures have not passed a law making the teaching of the United States Constitution compulsory: Therefore, be it

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut whether it is contemplated that District of Columbia business shall be considered next Monday?

Mr. TILSON. No; the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, which will be considered during the remainder of to-day, will go on next Monday. It is a privileged bill and as unfinished business will be in order on Monday. We hope to give the District another day later on.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There has been some inquiry about District business.

Mr. TILSON. It would be in order next Monday, but the appropriation bill as unfinished business would have the right of way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, the appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the control of general debate be divided between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself until we finally reach a time when we can agree on a limit of debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, the appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate for the time being be equally divided and controlled by himself and the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MADDEN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the bill under consideration deals with appropriations for the Post Office Department. It carries $764,000,000 for the biggest business on earth.

There is one paragraph in the report submitted by the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. MADDEN] to which I wish to direct your attention. It is found on page 29 and is as follows:

In connection with the figures of receipts, expenditures, and deficits of the Post Office Department attention should be called to the fact that the figures as presented, while they depict the situation in a fairly accurate manner, do not give a portrayal of the cost of the service on the same basis as a private business. Whether it is ever possible or desirable to attempt to set up an accounting system in a Government activity similar to that which would prevail if the activity were in private ownership is always a debatable factor, due to the difference in the ends sought to be accomplished by the Government and private business—one striving for profit and the other for service to its people. Progress is being made and very valuable information is being furnished in connection with the cost-ascertainment investigations of the department. While some of the costs revealed by these reports may be said not to be a proper charge against the Post Office Department, there should be recalled that the Post Office Department receives some advantages from its Government status which are not reflected in its expenditures. Chief among these is the space occupied by postal facilities in Government-owned buildings, of which there are 1,400 or more throughout the United States. A further program of building construction is authorized, which, under pending legislation, would bring the total up to $200,000,000 for new structures, in which a very large proportion of the space will be devoted to postal needs.

There is in this statement an accurate distinction between the Post Office Department and private business—

One strives for profit and the other for service to its people.

The greatest difficulty right now as to the post-office establishment is due to the fact that we have been attempting to operate it on both policies—profit and service. The result is a confusion, which will never be remedied until we make a straight-out declaration as to the service policy of the Post Office Department and act on that principle.

I am gratified that the Appropriations Committee has suggested this vital matter in its report. I would paraphrase one sentence in the paragraph I have read and make it read: "Due to the difference in the ends sought to be accomplished by the post office and private business—one striving for profit and the other for service of its people—the accounting system used by the Post Office Department should not be such as to hinder service to the people."

The present accounting does not show a true picture. In the balance sheet are items which are not understood to be free and partly free projects adopted by Congress, not as postal operations but as public-service provisions.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one feature of the yearly report of postal finances which is known to the public. That is the so-called deficit. But any consideration of that brings up the whole question of postal finances, which is a dry-as-dust subject to the average person. I defy any Member of Congress here to even read through the complicated, involved, tabulations in the cost-ascertainment report for 1927, which has been submitted by the department.

Yet United States postal finances are of vital concern in the consideration of the biggest business on earth. It handles 25,000,000,000 pieces of mail matter every year and carries 337,000,000 messages from residents of this country to friends and relatives in all the lands on the globe. It is the greatest agency of intercommunication ever devised. How important it is may be judged by the statement of Bryce in his classic treatise on "The American Commonwealth." In it he declared that the factor which makes us a united Nation "is the means of internal communication that holds the country together and renders it one for all social and political purposes as well as for commerce."

That such a mammoth public-service enterprise should be based upon a dollar-and-cent balance sheet is so absurd that Congress can not even attempt to act upon it. The real fact is that the present balance sheet itself furnishes the absurdity. Many times Congress has builded wiser than it knew, by paying no attention whatever to it.

What is the so-called postal deficit? Well, to judge from its prominence in department reports and in newspaper headlines one would judge that it is the one outstanding feature of this colossal business. The opening paragraphs of the Postmaster General's report for 1927 emphasize the deficit of some $28,000,000. Every newspaper in the land chronicled the deficit with such heads as that in the Washington Post: "Postal operations conducted at $28,000,000 loss." Others were "Post Office behind many millions in 1927," "Huge deficit in Postal Service," "Post Office fails to break even by $28,000,000."

The comments on the report ranged from characterization of the deficit as proof of extravagance and inefficiency to a declaration that the Post Office is a bankrupt business.

Such statements are grossly unfair to the Congress that makes appropriations, to the department that administers them, and to the postal personnel, the most efficient body of workers ever organized into a unit for cooperative efforts.

There is not a deficit of $28,000,000 in postal operations. There is a large surplus instead in postal operations. The so-called deficit, which looms so large, is due solely and wholly to free and partly free services which are given because Congress has made use of the great nation-wide postal organization in advancing the common welfare.

The cost of these policies is exactly on a par with expenditures for the Department of Commerce or the Department of Agriculture. No one points to a deficit in these departments, but to do so would be just as logical as in the case of the Post Office.

Let us analyze this so-called deficit. First there is the franking and penalty privilege, through which officials of the Government send without postage charge information as to the conduct of public affairs. It is a vital function, which should not be discontinued or even curtailed, but it is not a postal operation.

The Post Office Department informs me that the revenues which would be derived from the penalty mail sent by various departments would be $14,501,208, and that the actual cost of handling it is $6,263,620.

The franked mail sent out by Members of Congress and others at regular rates would bring in $532,652, and the actual cost to the department is stated as $520,691.

Therefore, in the so-called deficit there is at least $6,784,311, which is the bare cost of the service.

Second. Congress has directed for 75 years that small county newspapers should be sent within the county of publication to offices where there is no delivery without payment of postage. Not a cent is secured by the Post Office Department for this service. According to a department statement, the estimated cost is $9,000,000 a year.

That means that there should in all fairness be a reduction of the so-called deficit by $9,000,000. By no stretch of the imagination can such a policy be called a postal operation.

Third. In order to encourage the circulation of religious, fraternal, and similar publications not published for profit, Congress has established a special flat rate of 1½ cents a pound for such publications. This rate applies to advertising portions as well as reading matter.

There are more than 6,000 of these periodicals going through the mails at a rate which pays only a fraction of the actual cost of handling. It is a public-welfare project, which may or may not be justified, but it is in no sense a postal operation to be charged against postal revenues.

The Post Office Department informs me that the actual loss through such a policy is $16,000,000 a year. It makes up more than half of the reported deficit for last year. By any business system of bookkeeping it should be subtracted from the so-called deficit.

Fourth. Congress has adopted a ship-subsidy policy in connection with foreign mail. It is a worthy American policy in connection with the maintenance of a merchant marine. But it has no connection with actual postal operations, since the service would be performed by foreign vessels at one-half the cost. We should admit honestly that it is a policy for the encouragement of United States shipping. We should most assuredly not assess it against postal revenues.

The Post Office Department states that this policy costs $3,600,000 a year. That sum should be subtracted from the so-called deficit.

Fifth. Congress has decided that as a philanthropic measure publications in raised letters for the use of the blind shall go through the mails without payment of postage. This is no postal operation. It is a gift to the blind, with the post-office establishment made the agency for the gift. The department informs me that the actual cost is $32,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, here are five distinct governmental projects being carried out very properly through the Postal Service, the nation-wide agency of communication. Not one of them is as logical a postal operation as the construction of good roads, which no one would charge to postal revenues. They are public-welfare projects, and any post-office deficit built up out of them is a sham and delusion.

The actual cost of these five projects, according to the most conservative estimate of the department, is $35,426,000. This completely offsets the $28,000,000 reported deficit and leaves a substantial surplus instead. Any sensible accounting system would show this state of affairs in this great service department.

In dealing with this phase of postal finances I must add that there is another item which in my estimation is unfairly charged against postal revenues. I admit that it does not stand on all fours with the other items I have discussed, but in reality it is a public-welfare measure rather than a postal operation. I refer to the inevitable loss, after the most generous allowance for its part in postal operations, due to the rural free delivery.

This service is on a different basis than city delivery, Railway Mail Service, and other similar operations. These latter form the most economical method of handling the mails, and if a profit-making corporation were to take over the service these organizations would be continued exactly as at present.

Not so with rural free delivery. A profit-making company would slash it off at one stroke, and in so doing would reduce expenses more than $100,000,000. The express company delivers in the cities because it is cheaper to do that than to provide storage and clerical help to deliver all goods at the office. It compels the rural dweller to come to town for his express shipment because it is more economical than to deliver the goods to him. Exactly the same system would apply if the Postal Service were to be run on a profit-making basis.

However, Mr. Chairman, no good American wishes to curtail the Rural Free Delivery Service. I would extend it until every farmer and dweller in rural communities receive speedy and complete service. I believe the money expended is for the public welfare. It is true, also, that if mail were handled on these routes up to capacity the loss could be greatly diminished.

At present giving the Rural Free Delivery credit for every penny of postage on mail originating on the routes and half the revenues on all matter delivered, and using the figures in the Postmaster General's report for 1927, there would be a loss of $48,613.000 on the year.

Suppose we omit this entirely and leave it to be considered as a postal operation and nothing else. I have already shown that there is still a surplus instead of a deficit.

Is it not apparent, Mr. Chairman, that by any fair system of postal accounting the postal deficit is a myth and a delusion? It is not a fact but a state of mind. If postal policies are to be built on a false basis, the entire structure is certain to be out of plumb.

That is exactly the situation. Here is no mere technicality of accounting but a fundamental disorder which affects the entire postal system. The person unfamiliar with the true state of affairs says, "Why so much concern over a bookkeeping trifle? If there is a deficit, it comes out of the United States Treasury, just the same as if you charged the items against the Treasury in the first place. What real difference does it make?"

Such a question proves utter ignorance of the postal situation. What seems to be the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum in reality is the difference between fair postage rates and unjust postage rates; between complete postal service and inadequate postal service; between proper working conditions for postal workers and unjustifiable conditions.

That mythical deficit now sets the tune. As unsubstantial as the vampire of olden days, it does suck the blood from the postal system. It reduces service, lays too heavy a charge upon mail users, and robs the workers of rightful relief.

Let us consider these statements: First, the postage-rate problem. Under present conditions the great urge is to wipe out this deficit and balance the books. But in this deficit are all these governmental expenses, represented by free and partly free services.

Therefore, if that deficit is to be wiped out, users of the mails must pay not only all proper postal costs but also furnish the money for large governmental expenditures. The money from the sale of stamps must be used to send out the penalty package and the franked letter, the religious paper, and the publication for the blind. It must cover the cost of these public-welfare projects which should be met from the General Treasury as a benefit to all and not a few.

That is the reason, Mr. Chairman, why the Post Office Committee of the House is now so busily engaged in consideration of a bill reducing the rates on all classes of mail matter.

Here is a deficit, so called, of $28,000,000, and still the department and practically every Member of Congress agrees that there should be reductions in rates. The bill we are now considering, as introduced by Chairman GRIEST and as accepted by the department, would, according to department figures, reduce revenues by more than $10,000,000, and consequently add that much to the deficit. Still, the only objections from any quarter is that certain reductions do not go far enough.

Nor is such a feeling due altogether to the fact that the Postal Service does not pay dividends as does a private business, and therefore there is no injury to the pocketbook nerve when no profits are shown. It is due also to the fact that complete service is the prime function of this great organization, and rates should be in line with such a fundamental policy.

Of course, there are certain rates, such as that on post cards in first-class-mail classifications, where the 2-cent rate is so high that it has driven matter out of the mail and entailed a loss of some $6,000,000 instead of an estimated gain of $10,000,000. It was higher than the traffic would bear.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a table which shows the postage rates in force before 1925, the rates established by the act of February 28, 1925, and the rates now proposed. It is as follows:

Statement showing comparison between old rates, 1925 rates, and proposed rates

Class	Mail matter	Old rates	1925 rates	Proposed rates
First	Post cards, private mailing	1 cent each	2 cents each	1 cent each.
Second	Transient	1 cent 4 ounces	2 cents 2 ounces; over 8 ounces, parcel post.	1 cent 2 ounces.
	Publishers: Scientific, religious, etc., newspapers, periodicals, reading matter, 1½ cents pound.	1¼ cents pound	1½ cents pound	1½ cents pound.
	Advertising: Zones 1 and 2	2 cents pound	2 cents pound	1¾ cents pound.
	Zone 3	3 cents pound	3 cents pound	2½ cents pound.
	Zone 4	5 cents pound	6 cents pound	4 cents pound.
	Zone 5	6 cents pound	do	4¾ cents pound.
	Zone 6	7 cents pound	do	5½ cents pound.
	Zone 7	9 cents pound	9 cents pound	7 cents pound.
	Zone 8	10 cents pound	do	7¾ cents pound.
Third	Printed matter	Up to 4 pounds, 1 cent each 2 ounces; over 4, parcel-post rates.	Under 8 ounces, 1½ cents 2 ounces; over, parcel post.	Under 8 ounces 1½ cents 2 ounces; 20 pounds, 12 cents pound.
	Books, catalogues, seeds, etc	Under 8 ounces, 1 cent 2 ounces; over 8 ounces parcel post.	Under 8 ounces, 1 cent 2 ounces; over, parcel post.	Under 8 ounces, 1 cent 2 ounces; over parcel post.
Fourth	Merchandise over 8 ounces: Local zone	5 cents first pound; 1 cent each additional 2 pounds.	7 cents first pound; 1 cent additional 2 pounds.	7 cents first pound; 1 cent additional 2 pounds.
	Zones 1 and 2	5 cents first pound; 1 cent each additional pound.	7 cents first pound; 1 cent additional pound.	7 cents first pound; 1 cent additional pound.
	Zone 3	6 cents first pound; 2 cents additional.	8 cents first pound; 2 cents additional.	8 cents first pound; 2 cents additional.
	Zone 4	7 cents first pound; 4 cents additional.	9 cents first pound; 4 cents additional.	8 cents first pound; 4 cents additional.
	Zone 5	8 cents first pound; 6 cents additional.	10 cents first pound; 6 cents additional.	9 cents first pound; 6 cents additional.
	Zone 6	9 cents first pound; 8 cents additional.	11 cents first pound; 8 cents additional.	10 cents first pound; 8 cents additional.
	Zone 7	11 cents first pound; 10 cents additional.	13 cents first pound; 10 cents additional.	12 cents first pound; 10 cents additional.
	Zone 8	12 cents each pound	14 cents first pound; 12 cents additional.	13 cents first pound; 12 cents additional.
	Mailed rural routes		2 cents less parcel	2 cents less local first, second, and third; 1 cent less fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth zones.

Here is the statement furnished by the Post Office Department as to the effect on revenues of the proposed rate reductions:

Estimated net decrease in revenue

First class, post cards	$1,200,000
Second class:
Zone rate publications	3,860,000
Transient	100,000
Third class, bulk pound rates	7,000,000
Fourth class, service charge	2,200,000
Prospective loss in revenue	14,360,000

The proposed measure carries provisions as to business reply cards and envelopes, deficient postage, special delivery and special handling, which would bring in additional revenues, but I am dealing here only with the rates on the classes of mail matter.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say that the rate on first-class matter was so high that it yielded less revenue than before that rate was raised, but he does not make the same statement about the second-class matter. You are reducing the rate and getting less revenue in the second class.

Mr. KELLY. We get less revenue, according to the Post Office Department, yes. The contention is made that because of the present zone rates on advertising, there is less revenue received than there would be at a lower rate.

Mr. HASTINGS. How much less?

Mr. KELLY. No one knows that, but that contention is being made on the ground that great quantities of second-class matter go by private agencies now, but would come back to the Post Office Department at the lower rates.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is that a contention made by the Post Office Department?

Mr. KELLY. No; that is made by the users of the mail.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have received, as have doubtless other Members of the House, many letters from constituents saying that the 20-pound provision in third class is a discrimination in favor of mail-order houses. What has the gentleman to say to that contention?

Mr. KELLY. Discrimination against them?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; in favor of the mail-order houses.

Mr. KELLY. Even if the article weighed only one-half an ounce, the 20-pound limit would mean that about 640 separate pieces would need be mailed. Of course, very few business men send out less than 640 pieces. If they send that number they get the 20-pound rate just the same as the biggest mail-order house in the country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One correspondent said that he had always been accustomed to sending out 500.

Mr. KELLY. If his circular weighed two-thirds of an ounce he would get the 20-pound rate. If it weighed half an ounce, he would have to mail at 1½ cents for 2 ounces. The discrimination, if there is any there, and there is some objection to this rate, would be that mailing of less than 20 pounds would take a higher rate of postage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says, "If there is a discrimination." Ought not the law to be so drawn that there can be no possible discrimination against the country storekeeper in that regard?

Mr. KELLY. I do not want to get into an argument about the merits of this rate, because we have not taken action on it. I am trying to suggest that there is a serious proposition, the reason for reduction of postage rates, facing us in the Post Office Department with an alleged $28,000,000 deficit.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I have received several letters from seed houses down in my State as to first-class matter, desiring that the weight be raised from 8 ounces to 10 ounces, which would give them a cheaper distribution of their seeds, and so directly or indirectly benefit the farmer. What does the gentleman think of that?

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman refers to third class, and that proposal is being considered now. Anything under 8 ounces goes as third class, and anything over 8 ounces goes into the fourth class.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. These same gentlemen, I may say, would like pretty well to see the post-card rate go back to 1 cent.

Mr. KELLY. There is no difference of opinion in regard to that.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Is anything to be done as to the removal of the service charge on certain classes of mail?

Mr. KELLY. Yes; the proposed bill deals with the service charge in certain parcel-post zones.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will it be effective 200 miles from the shipping point?

Mr. KELLY. Not according to the proposed bill; no. Instead of having a 2-cent service charge beyond the third zone it would be reduced to 1 cent.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. How about the money-order department?

Mr. KELLY. There is a loss, according to the department, of $8,000,000. The rates ought to be changed on that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have had a great many inquiries from my district with reference to a proposition which, I understand, is before your committee, a proposal to prohibit the Government from further publishing and selling stamped envelopes with return addresses upon them. Has any action been taken in the committee on that matter, or has the committee given any consideration to it? I ask for the reason that I want to know how to intelligently answer these inquiries that are submitted to me.

Mr. KELLY. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that that question is perennial and has been before the committee repeatedly. Hearings requiring days have been given to it in past years. Another bill, proposing to prohibit the Government from printing these return cards on envelopes, is now before the committee but has not yet been given a hearing in this session.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. There is apparently no desire on the part of the committee to increase or make postal matters harder on newspapers and other publications coming within that class.

Mr. KELLY. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that the proposed provisions uniformly reduce the present rates. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to say that the Post Office Department has recognized the justice of the principle which I have repeatedly stated on this floor as to proper credit for free services. In the bill under consideration by the Post Office Committee there is provision for credit for some of these items I have discussed. It provides that the cost of franked, penalty, free in county, and free to the blind mail shall be set apart from other postal expenditures.

It does not go far enough, but it is a long step in the right direction and does some measure of justice to the Post Office Department. In the bill I introduced some time ago, I specified other items, which seem to me to be similar in principle, and I also provided for consideration of the rental charge of Government buildings, as mentioned in the report of the Appropriations Committee.

Unless we do build the Post Office Establishment on a service basis and have the accounting show it clearly, we will be swayed in every action by a fictitious deficit or stand unjustified criticism from those who conceive the entire Postal Service as a profit-making institution.

We have already gone so far that we have a schedule of postage rates which raises revenues for the payment of Government expenditures other than strictly postal operations.

Something can be said for such a plan, if honestly adopted. Several nations use it now in connection with the Postal Service. But I protest against its use by stealth and subterfuge. If we intend to adopt it, let us say so out in the open and act accordly. One thing is certain, it has not thus far been adopted as the American plan. On the contrary, it was definitely rejected by the founders of this Nation.

The makers of the Constitution which contains the postal power, specifically refused to give any such power to Congress. They said that the post office should be for the service of the people and not an institution for raising revenue.

The Pinckney plan submitted to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 provided that Congress should have power to "establish post offices and raise a revenue from them."

Mr. Patterson, on June 15, suggested a provision that Congress be empowered to raise revenues—

by a postage on all letters and packages passing through the general post office, to be applied to such Federal purposes as they shall deem proper and expedient.

The Constitution makers overwhelmingly rejected such suggestions. They rejected also the theory behind them. They foresaw that any attempt to raise revenue through the Postal Service would destroy its primary purpose. They knew that even the sketchy service of Revolutionary days had been the great unifying agency which makes a nation out of 13 colonies. They knew the importance of the Postal Service in the Nation and they did not propose to have it marred and crippled by any attempts to make it produce revenues.

Oh, the framers of the Constitution knew all about the possibility of making the post office a revenue producer. They were very familiar with the British system, which was built on that policy.

In 1785 the British postal system had a gross income of £463,753, with net revenues to the Government of £261,409. This amount took the place of so much tax money and was used to defray governmental expenses.

But the American nation builders had a different purpose in mind. They visioned a great postal institution for the service of every citizen. They had few means at hand for raising revenues. The finances were a far greater source of worry then than at present, when we can scarcely decide the amount of surplus to be turned back to the people. Still those statesmen forbade the use of postage rates for raising money to be used for governmental expenses. They refused to permit the raising of revenue through the post office.

They also expressly stated that the only methods for raising funds to meet governmental expenses should be through "laying and collecting taxes" and "borrowing money on the credit of the United States." Where certain methods are enumerated, all others are excluded.

Both in their action on the postal and the taxing provisions of the Constitution, the founders deliberately provided that revenues for the Government should not be raised through postage rates.

Congress has power to do anything which is necessary to create and maintain a Postal Service, but it must be for service, not for revenue raising. Congress can provide that any class of mail matter may be carried free if it decides such action would promote the common good. It may fix less-than-cost rates on any class of mail matter for the same reason.

But it certainly goes beyond its power when it decrees that certain classes of mail matter shall be carried free and certain services performed free and then makes other classes of mail matter and other services pay the cost of such policies.

I believe we should restore the constitutional American post office to the lines laid down by its founders, the statesmen who desired it to be a great unifying service institution.

But suppose we are not concerned about the judgment of the fathers of the Republic in this matter. Let us consider it as it faces us to-day, 140 years after the Constitution was framed. Is it good policy to-day to administer the Post Office Department on a revenue-raising basis? Shall postage rates be fixed so that revenues will show a balance over all expenditures? Shall every administrative effort have as its end the securing of a surplus at the end of the year? Shall we pay out of postal revenues for every free and partly free project adopted by Congress for the common welfare?

Such a policy means the transformation of this establishment into a revenue producer instead of a service giver. It makes profits, not service, the keynote in the Postal Service. For my part, I protest against any such policy.

Over the Washington post office is the real ideal of the Postal Service, quoted everywhere as a true and vivid summary of its purposes.

If we adopt the profit or revenue motive we should have to rewrite that statement as follows:

"Messenger of sympathy and love" (when there is a profit on the messages).

"Servant of parted friends" (in case the revenues will justify).

"Consoler of the lonely" (at so much per console).

"Bond of the scattered family" (if held to a self-sustaining basis).

"Enlarger of the common life" (in case the deficit is not enlarged).

"Carrier of news and knowledge" (when money can be made from the carriage).

"Instrument of trade and industry" (when the cost ascertainment shows it pays).

"Promoter of mutual acquaintance" (where the return to the promoter is sufficient).

"Of peace and good will among nations" (if it assures a postal surplus at the end of year).

No, Mr. Chairman, the American people have never advocated nor agreed to any such weasel qualifications of the aims of the Postal Service and they never will.

If I correctly interpret the public desire as to the Postal Service, they say to Congress:

"We ask that the Post Office Department render full and complete service at the lowest rates consistent with such service; perform such other public-welfare services as it is best fitted to carry out, to be paid for out of Treasury funds; maintain the most efficient organization possible through a personnel receiving compensation in line with American standards of living and the value of services rendered."

Such a command, if carried out, will make the Postal Service what it should be. Every family in the land should be served by the Postal Establishment. This great nation-wide organization should be used for every worthy project where it can best serve the national need. The army of workers who make the service possible should have compensation and working conditions which will serve as an example in justice to every American employer.

If we definitely determine upon the service policy and an honest accounting system, reductions in rates will be in harmony with that policy. We raised the rates in 1925 because the President and his advisers saw only the reported deficit and insisted that it dictate policy. In his veto message of June 7, 1924, returning the postal salary bill, he said:

> For the fiscal year 1923 the postal revenues were $32,000,000 less than the cost of the service for that year. This deficit had to be met from the moneys paid by the taxpayers. We should not add to the amount of the postal deficit, as is proposed by this bill, but should attempt as a sound business principle to have the users of the mails approximately pay the cost of the service.

Postage rates were increased because of a mythical deficit, and Congress will have to retrace its steps. When we do so, we should put up a signboard which will point the true road for the future. On it we should write the words for all to see and understand: "Not profits but service in the post office."

After all there has been, except for such short by-path excursions, a consistent policy in the formulation of postage rates and it may be seen through all the years since the service was established. Many Congresses have acted upon the subject and many changes have been made but they have followed one course throughout. There is a philosophy behind our postage rates. They do not form a random structure, a hit or miss system.

Our general policy as to postage rates may be formulated as follows:

First-class mail shall pay rates reflecting the fact that the postal organization is built primarily to carry letters and messages. The revenues shall be about the sum necessary to pay half the entire cost of actual postal operations.

Second-class mail. (1) To encourage county weekly papers; they shall be sent through the mails free to such offices as have no delivery system.

(2) To encourage religious, scientific, fraternal, and other publications not published for profit, there shall be a flat rate of 1½ cents per pound for the entire publication, including reading matter and advertising.

(3) Ordinary newspapers and other publications shall pay the full cost of carriage upon their advertising portions with a flat rate of 1½ cents a pound on reading matter.

(4) Newspapers sent by other than publishers shall pay the total cost of handling.

Third-class matter shall pay the total cost of handling.

Fourth-class matter shall pay the total cost of handling.

These are the traditional principles upon which rates are made. They are the proper principles. The confusion in which we have found ourselves for several years is due to two things: First, the insistence upon higher rates when just increase in compensation was granted to employees. Second, the cost ascertainment report which takes no account of the relative value of service given but links first-class mail with the other classes just as though a railroad company should figure freight rates on coal and automobiles on the same basis.

Both of these mistakes come back at last to the fictitious deficit. The inclusion of public-welfare projects with postal operations has showed a mythical loss on some classes of mail matter, while the refusal to recognize the real status of first-class mail has showed a mythical gain. It is time to decide upon a definite policy which will permit fair and square postage rates.

Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out that rate making in the Postal Service has been traditionally based on the policy of service. By making a mythical deficit the keynote of postal calculations we become involved in confusion and injustice. We force the users of paid mail service to pay for benefits to others than themselves. We compel them to pay not alone for the service given them but for a great deal besides.

The very first step toward fair and square rate making is to learn exactly what postal operations cost after deducting policy projects which are public welfare rather than postal. Then the costs may be apportioned to the classes of mail matter on a value of the service basis.

Postage rates is not the only question involved in a proper postal policy. When a fictitious deficit molds postal administration the service to which the American people are entitled is not given.

If expenditures for all purposes must be squeezed into the limits of revenues for paid mail matter the service is bound to be cut to the bone. Railway postal cars, where distribution en route would speed the mail, must give way to storage cars and closed-pouch service and terminal distribution. Carrier service must be cut to the minimum. Clerical help must be refused until the mail begins to pile up into a mountain. Laborers must do the work of clerks and save the difference in their compensation. Speed-up systems must be evolved to bring out the last ounce of energy. There must be arbitrary weight and unit standards forever advanced to the skill of the fastest worker.

"Twist the screws on costs and show a surplus" really means "keep the Postal Service to the point beyond which the public would rise in wrath."

Improper accounting which shows a fictitious deficit does more than produce too high postage rates and too little service. It means that postal workers must be denied improvements and betterments in working conditions to which every American worker is entitled.

Any suggestion for better conditions must be weighed against the deficit. For instance, the Postmaster General in two annual reports urged a differential for postal employees who work at night.

When the House committee tried to carry out his recommendation the favorable report was withdrawn on the ground of finances, which means the deficit.

Again the Postmaster General asked for legislation to permit the payment of actual and necessary expenses for moving the household goods of officers and regular clerks in the Railway Mail Service when arbitrarily transferred from one station to another for permanent duty.

The entire expense involved was but $10,000 a year, and the House committee desired to act on the recommendation. However, when the bill was sent to the department the reply was unfavorable because of the finances.

These are suggestions for improvements originating in the department. It is not difficult to judge the fate of suggestions which come from Members of Congress who are interested in providing fairer employment for the postal workers of the United States.

It simply means that any such step must be taken in the face of opposition from the department, which knows best what should be done. Because an inaccurate accounting system gives a deficit, every postal worker in the land must be denied conditions to which he is entitled; not only to which he is entitled, but which he has earned through devoted efforts.

First Assistant General Bartlett has given figures showing that in 1914 the average revenue per post-office clerk was $5,581. In 1927 it had risen to $7,951. In 1914 the average revenue per city letter carrier was $6,468; in 1927 it was $10,614. The average railway postal clerk is doing 30 per cent more distribution to-day than in 1914.

Surely it is not fair to compel workers who have shown such increasing efficiency to endure hardships because of a nonexistent deficit on a faulty and improper balance sheet.

Mr. Chairman, the true end sought to be accomplished by the Post Office Department is the service of the American people. That is the true keynote, the chief corner stone. With that service motive dominating, we can meet the problems of postage rates, increased service, and working conditions on a just and efficient basis.

I have asked this time in the general debate on this post-office appropriation bill to emphasize the need of a definite postal policy. If we decide upon the service policy and act upon it, it will benefit every American through a better, more efficient, and comprehensive Postal Service. That is a purpose well worth the while of this Seventieth Congress of the United States.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have taken the floor at this time to discuss the Box bill—H. R. 6465—a bill introduced in the House by my colleague, Representative JOHN C. BOX, and which seeks to place the same quota restrictions on Mexican immigration as applies to immigration from the European countries.

I have received a good many communications from organizations in Texas asking me how I stand on this bill. One of the organizations which has written me on the subject is the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, and I now ask to have read in my time my reply to that letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 10, 1928.

Hon. HOMER D. WADE,
Manager West Texas Chamber of Commerce,
Stamford, Tex.

MY DEAR MR. WADE: I have received your letter of January 31, 1928, in which you urge that the present immigration laws, so far as they relate to Mexico and Canada, be left intact, at least for the present; and you state that in making this request you speak for the West Texas Chamber of Commerce. You also request that I advise you what my attitude is on the question involved.

I will be very glad to tell you. I am unequivocally in favor of the Box bill, which seeks to place Mexican immigration under the same quota restrictions as now apply to European immigration. Not only am I in favor of this bill, but I expect to do what I can to help get action on it at this present session of Congress. To that end I have asked to be heard by the Committee on Immigration of the House of Representatives when it begins its hearings on the Box bill next week. I shall appear before the committee and urge favorable consideration of the bill at this session of Congress.

The argument used by some that we need a large influx of Mexican immigration, because it furnishes cheap labor, makes no appeal to me. In the first place, there is no scarcity of labor in the United States, taking it as a whole, and there is none in Texas. In fact, the labor supply is more than ample. The truth of the matter is there is serious unemployment in many sections of the United States, and some authorities estimate the number of unemployed at 4,000,000 men.

In the next place, even if there were no large amount of unemployment, it is a very short-sighted policy for certain large business interests in the United States to advocate lax immigration laws to get cheap labor. It is sowing to the wind to afterward reap the whirlwind. Capital in the long run can only prosper in the truest and best sense by doing full justice to labor. And while a temporary advantage might be gained in the way of larger profits by beating down wages and lowering the American standards of living through a wholesale and unrestricted foreign immigration, yet the results in the end would be disastrous.

Radicalism and discontent would stalk abroad and would fasten their tentacles to the vitals of American business and commerce and, Samson-like, would pull down the pillars of our whole economic structure on our heads.

Aside from economic reasons, there are strong reasons of a social nature why our Nation should pursue a policy of selective and restrictive immigration. As to the soundness of this position I am well convinced. And I am further of the opinion that these selective and restrictive provisions of the law should apply to Mexican immigration, just the same as to any other, and I shall certainly vote that way at every opportunity I have.

Yours sincerely, EUGENE BLACK.

[Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, statistics show that about 50,000 immigrants come to the United States annually from Mexico, and during the last year this number increased to more than 60,000. Unless restrictions are imposed this number is certain to increase from year to year and before we are aware of it we will have a Mexican population in the United States of several millions of people. It seems to me that every consideration of common sense and good judgment would require that we impose quota restrictions at this time and avoid serious complications in the future.

If we pass the Box bill and put Mexican immigration under quota restrictions, the number of immigrants that would come to the United States thereafter from Mexico would be less than 3,000 annually.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION DOES NOT SIGNIFY RACIAL PREJUDICE OR HATE

I do not advocate a policy of rigid immigration restriction because I entertain in my heart any element of racial prejudice or hate against any nation of people in the world. I certainly entertain no ill feeling toward the Mexican people or the Mexican Government. I am anxious to see every nation, kindred, and tongue to earth's remotest bounds climb the ladder of success and improve their standards of living, health, and moral welfare. I would like to see ill feeling and distrust and sectional animosities vanish from the face of the earth. Such a consummation is the Utopia to which we all would look with fond desire.

I would like to see the United States of America play the largest possible part toward the achievement of a better feeling and a more perfect understanding among the nations, but we do not have to sacrifice any of our national aspirations and desires in order to play this useful part in the world's affairs. In fact, the more we would allow our cherished institutions, builded and established by our forbears, to be undermined and destroyed by an inundation of immigrant masses, either hostile to those institutions or unable to understand them, the less we would be able to contribute to the onward march of humanity.

The very best service we can render to the world, and the largest contribution we can possibly make to the sum and total of human happiness is to keep our country a land of improving standards of living, of cleaner moral perceptions, of more robust physical and mental health, and of finer ideals of government. We can not do this if we are careless and indifferent about the elements which make up our composite citizenship. There are two outstanding considerations which make restriction of immigration imperative. There may be other reasons, but these two impress me most. They are:

First. Protection of American standards of living for American labor against the demoralization which would result from unrestricted immigration.

Second. Protection of American Government and American institutions against the imperfect and distorted ideas of those who have never been trained to self-government and who have but little understanding of its true meaning and significance.

These reasons not only satisfy me as to the correctness of my support in favor of this Box bill, but they go further than that; they make it my imperative duty to vote for it if I get the opportunity.

Mr. HARDY Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

The SPEAKER. Gentlewomen and gentlemen of the House, it is my pleasure to announce the presence in the diplomatic gallery of his excellency the French ambassador. [Applause.] Accompanying him are Lieut. Commander Joseph Lebrix and Lieut. Dieudonné Costes [applause], who have just completed their epoch-making flight of more than 23,000 miles from Paris to Washington. [Applause.] Their presence here is another evidence of that friendship, strong and imperishable, which exists between our two great countries. [Applause.]

Mr. Ambassador and gentlemen, on behalf of the House of Representatives of the United States, I bid you a warm and affectionate welcome. [Applause.]

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, just before the committee rose in honor of our distinguished guests, Lieut. Commander Joseph Lebrix and Lieut. Dieudonné Costes, trans-Atlantic flyers, I said that in our desire as a nation to promote good feeling and better understanding among other nations of the world it is not necessary to sacrifice in any degree our right to deal with immigration and other domestic problems of that nature in whatever way we see proper.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. The quota law applies to Great Britain, France, and the other great nations of the world alike, but the Central and South American countries and Mexico and the islands may dump their people—white, Indian, and black—on our shores without any restrictions as to quota whatsoever, and more than 1,000 of the negroes, mostly from these islands, were sent here without any restriction last year.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that it is correct that the nations which he has enumerated at the present time are not under any quota restrictions at all, and the provisions of the Box bill would repeal that provision of the present immigration law, which exempts them from quota restrictions, and would place all of the nations enumerated by the gentleman from Florida under the same quota restrictions as are the European nations.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. I am very much in sympathy with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Texas. It is a great need that has long been recognized; in fact it was recognized at the time of the passage of the immigration bill that our back door was left open for indiscriminate immigration.

Does the Box bill set up the necessary machinery to enforce the quotas provided for under its provisions?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; it undoubtedly does that; in fact, I will call the attention of my friend from Oklahoma to the fact that the purpose of the Box bill is to repeal outright that subdivision of the law which now permits them to come in without quota restrictions.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to my colleague from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have not read the Box bill as introduced at this session, but does it apply the quota restriction also to Canada?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes. I will say to the gentleman it repeals the entire subdivision to which I have just referred, and that subdivision does include the Dominion of Canada. In fact, I will say to my friend from Texas, the purpose of the Box bill is to place all immigrants upon the same quota basis; and let me say further I think it is a thoroughly sound idea. It is one within the rights of the American people to enact, and for reasons I will undertake to show briefly it is one that we ought to enact.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I did not hear the opening part of my colleague's statement, but I understand the gentleman stated that so many thousand came into the United States each year.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. There were about 68,000 of these immigrants last year from Mexico.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Can my colleague from Texas state, if he has the information, how many of these Mexicans returned to Mexico?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not have those figures, but I will be pleased to endeavor to get them from the Department of Labor and put them in the RECORD.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to have the figures on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. May I have five minutes more in order to complete my statement?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more. I will yield the gentleman more time if he desires it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I thank the gentleman. Does my colleague desire me to yield to him any further?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not want to take up my colleague's time unless it is entirely agreeable to him; but I have more questions I would like to propound.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will be very pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. These Mexicans who come into the United States come in for the purpose of picking cotton along the Rio Grande and working on the ranches. They are used for seasonable labor when no other kind can be supplied in most instances. Now, can my colleague tell me how many of these Mexicans have ever been accused of crimes or indicted for crimes? I would like to have this information if my friend from Texas has it available.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I wish my colleague to understand that I am not making any assault upon the Mexican people. I intend to try to show briefly that it would be a social mistake as well as an economic mistake to fill up this country with several million Mexican population; but in order to do that, I do not have to make any attack upon the Mexican people, and I have not made any, and I do not intend to make any.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I did not so understand; but I will state to my colleague if they are coming in and going back, being used simply as seasonal labor, then where is the harm in that to the American people, or where is the economical or social mistake? I do not know of many, if any, American laborers they displace on the farms or ranches in my district.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the gentleman's premise was correct——

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think I will show the gentleman in time that it is correct. At least, I will try to do so.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman will have his opportunity to do that. I do not think the gentleman is correct. Many of them come over here and never go back.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The Box bill, as I understand, removes all quota discrimination?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; it does, indeed, and places all upon a quota basis.

Mr. ALLGOOD. It places all countries upon the same basis, which is fair.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, may I proceed further with the thought I was developing at the time I was interrupted, and, of course, I take no exception at all to the interruptions. I like to participate in discussions with my colleagues, whether they agree with me or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I received a circular letter from the West Texas Agricultural Chamber of Commerce a day or two ago in which they set out the needs for more freedom of admission across the Mexican border in order that the farm units of west Texas might be better able to cultivate the soil. What merit is there in that?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will say there is about the same merit in that argument as has been made by all the employers of labor who seek to break down the immigration restrictions and allow into the United States an influx of cheap labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I want to say that I voted for the immigration bill, but I would like to see how far we are going. Would the provision in the Box bill that the gentleman speaks of be applicable to restricting the immigration of Indians from Mexico and Guatemala?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; the Box bill, as I have stated in my remarks, seeks to repeal that provision of the immigration law which permits certain nations of the Western Hemisphere, including, of course, Mexico and Guatemala, to come into the United States without quota restrictions.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Does that not look rather extraordinary to provide restrictions against the race that was already in America when we, the white people, came here?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The people to whom the gentleman refers were not aborigines of the United States. Let me say to my friend from Louisiana, whom I esteem very highly, does he not recognize the serious problem involved, both from the standpoint of racial stock and the standpoint of social and economic reasons—does not he recognize the seriousness of the situation of allowing a large influx of Mexican immigrants such as is now coming in? Would it not be better to apply the same quota restrictions to the nations of the Western Hemisphere, including Mexico, as we apply to European countries?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. As I stated, I voted for the immigration law, but in all fairness it is extraordinary for the people who came to America as an extension of European stock to divest the people who originally owned the country, and at this time make them prisoners in the land of their ancestors.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The sentiment which the gentleman from Louisiana seeks to invoke does not exist, because such would not be the effect of the Box bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not like to take up the time of my colleague, but if I understand from his support of the Box bill he is afraid that if the Mexicans are brought in here they will have a tendency to lower the standards of American institutions in this country?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I said that it would inevitably lower the standard of living.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does not the gentleman know that we have Mexicans born in this country? Many of them fought under the Stars and Stripes in the World War.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. We have a large voting population, I understand, of Mexicans in some of the counties along the Rio Grande.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In my city of El Paso, according to the last estimate I saw, there are about one-third of them Mexicans. There are about 16,000 voters, and as I remember now about 2,000, or probably a few more, voted in our last primary. I think a great part of this number were born in the United States. Some Mexicans were here before the Battle of San Jacinto. Some fought under General Houston against the tyrant Santa Anna—and the first Vice President of the Republic of Texas was a patriotic Mexican—Texon-Antonio De Zavolla.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am not going to permit the gentleman to put me in the attitude of making any attack on the Mexican people. I expressly disclaim any desire to make any attack on the Mexican people. I have no feeling against the Mexican Government, but I do say that I earnestly believe that both from social and economical standpoints there is every reason that we should apply the quota law to Mexico the same as to other countries.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Apropos of Mexicans being in Texas when independence was acquired, were not the English and Scotch here when we acquired our liberty, and do not the restrictions against them apply to-day?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. They certainly do; the quota applies to people over the seas from whom we sprung.

My colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, has asked me some questions and I shall ask him some. Does he think there is any less reason for applying the quota restrictions to the Mexican immigrants than there is for applying them to immigration from England or Scotland or Wales or Ireland?

Mr. HUDSPETH: For this reason: I have always understood that the quota has not been applied to our neighbors on the north or south.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am trying to answer it if the gentleman will restrain himself. I have understood that it has never hereto been applied to the countries bordering on the United States, and from the ones that come into my district—and I think most of them return in a few months—I can see no great reason for applying it to either Canada or Mexico.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It has not been, but we hope to do it by the Box bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The English when they come here, come here to remain permanently, as I understand. If we can not get any other class of laborers than Mexicans to pick our cotton and work on our ranches, what are we going to do? Abandon our farms and our ranches, I will ask my friend from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not admit that the situation is so deplorable as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Three or four years ago I introduced a resolution to bring out the facts as to the number of Mexicans that were brought in seasonally. I found them as far north as the beet-sugar fields of Michigan. It was then suggested that that labor was not available in Texas, and my resolution remained in the committee. Is it because that labor is not available in Texas, or is it because they desire to keep wages down?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. My own view is, and I will be very frank about it, that taking Texas as a whole, excluding perhaps some isolated localities, there is an ample supply of labor in Texas for all reasonable purposes. In fact, I think there is quite a good deal of unemployment in some sections.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If I understood the gentleman's position in support of the Box bill, it is that by permitting Mexicans to come into this country it will lower the standard of living?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And would that apply to Central and South America?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It would.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Would the gentleman apply the quota to all those countries?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Certainly, and the Box bill undertakes to do it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Would the gentleman apply it to Canada?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes. The Box bill does that. The purpose of the Box bill is to wipe out all the exceptions from the quota provisions, and I am earnestly in favor of doing it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And if they amend that bill so as to apply the quota to Mexico alone, would the gentleman support the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Certainly; but I do not think that is the way it ought to be done. I do not know of any good reason why we should exempt any nation from the quota provisions. I go further and say that it is thoroughly within the rights of the American people to properly restrict immigration. No nation has a right to consider it an unfriendly act on our part, but they will have a right to so consider it if we continue to discriminate.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is what I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am not in favor of any discrimination. I stand ready to go before the Committee on Immigration, and I intend to go before it and advocate the passage of the Box bill in exactly the form in which it is now drawn, and that is to apply the quota restrictions to all nations alike.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I asked the gentleman a question a moment ago, and he answered it in one way, that if we apply the quota to Mexico, he would apply it to all of the other countries, but if the bill should be amended either in the committee or on the floor so as to apply the quota only to Mexico, does the gentleman think that that would be treating the Mexicans right?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not think really that the gentleman has a right to ask me what I would do in a supposititious case, and yet I do not mind answering him. I shall support the bill even though it is amended in the respect the gentleman states. I would prefer, however, that it be not so amended.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is not the reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], with the exception of one or two points on the Canadian border, Canada does not present any such labor problem as Mexico does.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That is true. I do not think that we have much immigration from the Dominion of Canada. I do not think that they would object to being included under the same quota provision as their mother country, England.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I voted for the immigration bill. If it should be shown that most of the immigrants, or a large majority of them, come over here only for seasonal labor and return to Mexico after a stay of two or three months, would the gentleman still be in favor of applying the quota?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman is supposing again.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I say if it should be so?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I decline to be led into a discussion of a supposititious case.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Probably this can be shown. I feel sure it is the case largely in my district.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not think the gentleman can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have listened to the questioning of the gentleman by his colleagues from Texas and elsewhere. One of them, I think, was strongly in favor of a tariff on cattle and one of a tariff on hides, but from his questioning I infer that he now wants free trade in labor. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think that is a correct interpretation of the gentleman's attitude.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. MADDEN. It is a most interesting statement, coming from the gentleman. I think the gentleman should interest himself in watching the psychology of the situation, where in Congress there is a demand for a further restriction of immigration and at the same time a demand for the greatest freedom in immigration.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin I will say that there is a tariff on Mexicans coming in now of $8 a head, and besides there is a "literacy test" applied to all Mexicans coming into the United States, and they must be compelled to come in legally through regular ports of entry.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Regardless of what may apply to Mexico and Canada, I would like my colleagues to remember that it is permitting those West India islands to dump their negroes into Florida, and we are tired of it. Of course, some of their citizens are splendid white people.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say, except to reiterate that I am a supporter of the Box bill and will go before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and do what I can to get a favorable report on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my time I wish to read from the Washington Post, of recent date, an editorial, as follows:

THE LANKFORD BILL

When the House Committee on Agriculture gets time it may consider the bill which Mr. LANKFORD, of Georgia, introduced early in December, and which has thus far languished in the files of the committee without showing signs of life. The Lankford bill proposes to give into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture $1,000,000 with which to "experiment in the organization of producers' clubs and consumers' clubs, the sale of food and food products from producers' clubs and others to consumers' clubs and others."

It would go further still and authorize the Secretary to experiment with the "establishment of eating centers, owned and operated by farm organizations or clubs, for the purpose of advertising and extending the sale of farm products and for the purpose of profit." But that is not all. The Lankford bill would give the overworked Secretary of Agriculture the right and power to demonstrate to the public generally the real value of pure food, directly from the farm, "carefully prepared."

The department for several years past has been ready with astronomical formulas for figuring the future price of hogs, and has just issued a leaflet in which the farm boy may learn how to erect a rabbit hutch (Leaflet No. 15–L). The housewife has only to send a postal card to obtain an interesting bulletin which will tell her how to make her aprons and undergarments. The department also tells her how to get her shoes repaired before the heels "turn over." It is possible that, having issued so many aids to life, the thousands of employees over on the Mall and in the rented buildings outside are pining for new worlds to conquer. The opportunity will be presented when Congress adds the million provided in the Lankford bill. With that money an enterprising bureau can lay the foundation for demanding additional millions for the installation and upkeep of eaters' clubs.

Mr. Chairman, my faith in my bill is now doubly confirmed. The hit dog always barks. The Washington Post, the champion of the unnecessary profiteering middlemen, whom I am seeking to eliminate, is expected to howl.

The Government gives fabulous sums to Italy and other foreign nations, donates either directly or indirectly untold millions to railroads, manufacturers, international bankers, and others, and with a lavish hand experiments in almost everything under the sun except the selling of food and food products directly from the producer to the consumer. Of course, I am heart and soul in favor of my bill and shall argue for and urge its passage at every opportunity. I shall endeavor to argue it at length and in details in the next few days.

The Post editor is evidently very much against legislation for the producer and consumer. He thinks the big speculator owns the Nation and the fullness thereof. He objects to bulletins which cost much less than 1 cent each being issued to tell folks how to make a pair of shoes last a little longer, and yet favors laws that helps the manufacturers of shoes and others to rob the owner of that pair of shoes of thousands of dollars by a series of petty larcenies committed almost every day and every time the poor fellow buys any article of food or clothing. The editor sees great loss to the Government in the printing of a few farmers' bulletins which may prove helpful to the farmer, and yet the editor evidently approves as an act of the highest patriotism the stealing of millions and millions of dollars' worth of oil leases from the people of the Nation by Doheny, Sinclair, and Fall, with the aid and connivance of the president and owner of the editor's paper.

My bill seeks to help all who produce and all who eat—and that includes all of us. I would like to see an experiment station in the big cities where people could buy raw and cooked food directly from the farm. We would find just how cheaply the best food in the world can be placed on the hungry consumer's table. The farmer would get much more for his product. The consumer would get much fresher and better food for less money. All would be benefited except the unnecessary profiteer, and he would be justly eliminated. Let us pass this bill and also my bill to create the farmers' finance corporation to assure the farmer a fair average price for basic agricultural products such as cotton and tobacco, and the farm problem will disappear like morning mist before the sun. I have also introduced a bill providing for an extension of the parcel-post system so as to help the farmer deliver his food products directly from the farm to the consumers hundreds and thousands of miles away. There is no need for middlemen in the handling of food from the producer to the consumer. Let us put the fresh products of the farm on the table of the consumer each morning thousands of miles away just like the newspapers are ready for their readers, hundreds and thousands of miles away, every day.

Let us not be discouraged if we fail temporarily. Out of all this effort and fight should come—I hope very soon—a proper solution of the farmers' problems. The apparent failure and "wild Utopian dream" of to-day will be the success of to-morrow. Good comes out of every sincere effort in behalf of the right. Lowell wrote:

Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne.
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own.

Justice rules. Progress never stops. The farmers some day will come into their own. May God speed the hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time I may not have used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 8 minutes and yields back 12 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, all real Americans are proud of the high standard of living conditions enjoyed by the folks who toil on the farms and in the great industrial plants of this country.

Steady employment at good wages means more and better food, better clothing, better homes, more of them owned instead of rented, more opportunity for the children's education and advancement, a savings account for the proverbial "rainy day," and a chance to get acquainted with a few of the world's luxuries rather than to grind out an existence with bare necessities as the only reward for service.

The protective tariff policy, a fundamental of Republican faith, has been instrumental in the betterment of living conditions of our American workmen to a degree that has excited the wonder of the world. Never before in the country's history has there been such a concerted effort to break down this tariff policy. The most insistent demand comes from the international bankers who, having loaned vast sums abroad, are vastly more concerned regarding industrial success in Europe than they are for the welfare of American workmen and their families. Like Shylock, these bankers cry out and demand their pound of flesh; and if in the taking the lifeblood of American industry is drained to the last drop, it will be to them but a mere incident. The attitude of the international bankers has brought great joy to the Democratic camp, and they welcome this new convert to the free trade, alias "tariff for revenue" faith. Mr. Importer, from his retreat furnished gorgeously in orientals, shouts a loud "Amen, brother," and joins lustily in the chorus of the Democratic hymn:

Down with the tariff,
It's nothing but a tax;
If argument is futile,
Then let's take an ax.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What has the gentleman to say as to the attitude of some 14 Republicans from the Western States?

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, I do not recognize them as Republicans as I know men of Republican faith and traditions. They are temporarily, at least, off the reservation.

Here we have an example of the much-discussed "companionate marriage," the Democratic Party and the international bankers being the high contracting parties, while the importers give away the bride, and holding themselves in prayerful attitude say, "Bless you my children, bless you."

Many of our key industries are lagging as a result of foreign competition, and on the list we find manufacturers of rugs, glassware and plate glass, pottery, bricks, cement, shingles, monumental stone, fabric gloves, veneers and plywood, calf leather, and cotton and woolen textiles. Of those mentioned, bricks, cement, shingles, and calf leather and monumental stone are on the free list, and no opportunity of relief is offered through the flexible clause of the present tariff act.

In fact, as I wrote to one of my friends who was actively interested in one of these great industries, it did not look to me as being possible for us to have any tariff legislation at this time. Any attempt to revise schedules would unsettle the business of the country; manufacturers would be in a quandary as to production; merchants would adopt the hand-to-mouth policy in buying; and a general depression of business would result. The producers who, unfortunately, are on the free list are in the position of the boy who was afflicted with a violent toothache. He lived 20 miles from a dentist, and all the comfort his friends could give was to say to him, "You will have to grin and bear it." These people will have to grin and bear it until such time as we have opportunity under the right conditions to revise the tariff. The boy's answer, however, was that "he would bear it, but he'd be darned if he'd grin." The manufacturers whose products are on the free list will probably feel that same way.

The recent discussion in the United States Senate on the McMaster resolution for reduction of tariff duties brought out the fact that the Democratic Members, together with a few so-called Republicans, were anxious to revise the tariff rates but wanted them revised downward.

The fact of the matter is that the Fordney-McCumber bill was written at a period when industrial activity in Europe was paralyzed and foreign currency so depreciated in value that invoice prices meant almost nothing in dollars. During the nearly six years that have elapsed since the passage of the bill, industrial conditions have changed materially and there has been a gradual increase of foreign merchandise to our ports. The tariff bill that its opponents stated would stifle European trade and prevent foreign countries from doing business with the United States has been the greatest revenue producer we have ever had, over $600,000,000 having been paid at the custom-houses in 1926. So that instead of revision downward, the rates on many commodities should be raised, and a great many articles now on the free list should be protected by a reasonable rate of duty.

The knitted outerwear manufacturers have the highest protection under the present wool schedule and yet it is insufficient. In spite of this apparently high tariff on their goods, the import figures supplied by the Government show that in 1926, under present rates, compared with 1922, the last year of the Underwood bill, the imports of wool knitted underwear have increased over 360 per cent; imports of woolen knitted gloves, 200 per cent; imports of silk knitted outerwear, 139 per cent; imports of cotton knitted fabrics increased 1,600 per cent; and imports of cotton knitted gloves increased over 900 per cent.

The United States woolen and cotton knit-glove production for 1921 amounted to $21,308,700 and shrank in 1925 to $8,339,612. The above figures I have taken from your association's National Bulletin of July, 1927.

In four leading department stores in Washington I found that the fabric gloves with embroidery on backs and cuffs all had tags attached to each pair marked "Made in Germany" and "Made in Saxony," and the retail price has been increased to nearly double as compared with the prices in 1921.

During the period from 1922 to 1926 imports of cotton gloves (knitted) increased from $645,365 to $6,534,515, and the fabric-glove industry has been destroyed in this country as a result of insufficient protection.

The advantages of the European producers may be listed as follows: Low labor costs, low material costs, and extra hours of labor which are provided for in many cases by special agreement between industrial associations and the government. In Italy where labor is presumed to account for 50 per cent of production costs, women up to 17 years of age receive a daily wage of lire 9.9, or about 50 cents; women over 17 years, 19 lire, or about 95 cents; males up to 17 years, 13 lire, or about 65 cents; males over 17 years, 34 lire, or about $1.70.

These figures include amounts that were described by your President as living bonuses.

In Switzerland the wages paid to beginners are as follows:

Men, from 16 to 18 cents per hour.
Boys, 15 to 16 years of age, 10 to 12 cents per hour.
Girls, 15 to 16 years of age, 8 to 10 cents per hour.

The 48-hour week prevails here, but special permission can be had to work 52 hours at the regular wage rate. As soon as a manufacturing concern in Switzerland employs six people the State recognizes it as a factory, and it must be registered. This enables their associations to keep informed as to new concerns, and they endeavor to secure them as members, so that they are enrolled up to about 97 per cent.

Germany is back to normal so far as production is concerned, and is probably the strongest contender facing us to-day in the race for industrial supremacy. Skilled male labor receives 16 cents per hour, skilled female laber 10 cents per hour. Rayon prices in Germany run from 70 to 87 cents per pound, according to grade, about two-thirds of American costs. Rayon yarns can be purchased for about one-half of American costs.

WAGES

FRANCE

Males, 11 to 14½ cents per hour.
Females, 10 to 12 cents per hour.
Skilled knitters, 10 per cent higher.

AUSTRIA

Skilled labor, $5.07 per week.
Hand knitters, $3.91 per week.
Juvenile workers, $2.26 per week.

ENGLAND

Average weekly wage, $8.33.
Average skilled males, $13.43.
Average skilled females, $6.92.

UNITED STATES

Unskilled average, $18 to $30.
Skilled knitters receive $30 to $60.

In view of these tremendous differences in production costs, it is plain to be seen that without a tariff rate that is really protective knitted-outerwear industry would be hard pressed, and in parlance of the times "up against it." A reduction in the present rates would no doubt be a severe blow to the industry and result either in a complete cessation of activities or a radical cut in wages that would mean hardship and misery to thousands of their employees.

The present tariff rate is all that lies between them and the utter annihilation of their business.

There evidently is a necessity for higher rates in other manufactures of cotton, as the Tariff Commission lists in their 1926 report the following applications for surveys since 1922:

Nankin ticking, cotton cloth, cotton cloth (fine), cotton shirtings, cotton goods, spreads and quilts, woven labels, fabric gloves, hosiery, and heavy coat lining.

The 1927 report will no doubt show a decided increase in applications for investigation as to foreign production costs. Applications for increased duty are made by the manufacturers and the demand for decrease comes from the importers. If the United States Senate had held to their original agreement with the House of Representatives as to the adoption of American valuation as a basis for assessment of duties, the delays incident to investigation by the Tariff Commission would have been avoided. The bill was prepared by the Ways and Means Committee in the supposition that American valuation would be adopted and rates were adjusted to that plan. This labor on the part of the committee was all wasted and the importers all gave three cheers for the Senate.

The flexible clause was a sop to the supporters of American valuation, and while it has been of some value in several instances, it is a doubtful constitutional procedure to transfer the rate-making power from the Congress to the President, no matter who he may be or of what political faith.

POTTERY

I am informed on reliable authority that if all the pottery kilns were being run at capacity they could only supply 75 per cent of the pottery requirements of the country. To-day they are running at less than 50 per cent capacity and importations of foreign pottery are increasing steadily.

The pottery manufacturers, as well as the manufacturers of other commodities, will be compelled to ask that section 315 (b) be applied to their cases, which permits an ad valorem duty to be based and assessed upon the American selling price. This procedure is an absolute necessity in many cases where the flat raise of 50 per cent of present duty would be of no value.

The fabric-glove industry was developed in this country as a war industry. They were unable to import the fabric gloves during the war, and the use of these knit gloves by the women of the country to take the place of kid gloves became universal during that period. The fabric gloves were made at the behest of the great department stores of this country, who came to the manufacturers and asked them if they could not produce something that would be a commercial success in that line. They did so. Yet when they came here to ask for a protective rate, they were denied, and the result is that the fabric-glove industry has been destroyed in this country. These great department stores are anxious that industrial employees leave a goodly portion of their pay check with them every week, but they are arrayed in battle formation against their employers when they seek tariff rates that will enable them to meet foreign competition.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CROWTHER. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Did they not apply to the Tariff Commission for an increase of duty?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes. That was denied them.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. How do you account for it, under your statement, that they would not give them relief?

Mr. CROWTHER. I can not account for it. This is one instance at least where the flexible clause did not work to the advantage of the American manufacturers. The statement of the President, as I remember it, was that in spite of an ad valorem of 75 per cent there had been a constant falling off in production in this country. That was a statement of fact, but, to my way of thinking, was a logical reason for allowing the increase of 50 per cent provided by the flexible clause rather than an argument for denying it.

I am not so much concerned about foreign production costs. I really do not think we need them and if I could have my way about it I would do away with necessity of ascertaining them. Allow me to present a practical case. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] is a manufacturer in his State and I am an importer in a neighboring city importing the same kind of goods he manufactures, he is not at all concerned about production costs at the factory in Germany or France. What he is really concerned about is the price at which I can buy that article laid down on the American dock with freight, insurance, and packing paid. That is what interests him and nothing else. I do not think it is necessary for us to go snooping into the offices of business concerns in foreign countries, as we do under our present Tariff Commission act, and endeavor to examine their books and records for the purpose of determining their production costs. I do not think that if any of you gentlemen had a business and agents of the Government from France, Italy, or Germany came to your office Monday morning and said, "We are here to go through your books for the purpose of ascertaining your production costs in this plant," that they would get a very warm reception. They might get a courteous reception, but it would not be overwarm or overenthusiastic, and you would probably get rid of them as quickly as you could, and I do not think you would grant their request.

Here is what Great Britain did when they wrote their safeguarding of industries clause a number of years ago. You will remember that the Englishman is very loath to use the word "protection," but he calls it safeguarding of industry. They wrote that safeguarding of industries act during the war period, and they have added many hundreds of articles to it since, at a 33⅓ per cent duty.

I might add, in passing, that Great Britain is gradually changing as the years go by and the Cobden theory of free trade is becoming gradually dissipated and thrown to the winds. She is becoming very strongly and very materially a country where they believe in the protection, the safeguarding, as they call it, of industry. Here is what they adopted with regard to value:

> Where the rate of a duty of customs imposed by this act on any article is a percentage of the value of the article, that value shall be taken to be the price which an importer would give for the article, if it were delivered, freight and insurance paid, in bond at the port of importation, and duty shall be paid on that value as fixed by the commissioners.

So England long ago determined to have home valuation. I trust we may be able to incorporate such a provision in our next tariff bill in connection with ad valorem duties.

When the House and Senate wrote the Fordney-McCumber bill they in a sense declared their fallibility when they agreed to the flexible clause, because they knew conditions abroad were such that very rapid and important changes were liable to take place in the succeeding months and years. They used their best judgment and it has been helpful in several cases. But here is another thing they did. They declared themselves absolutely infallible as regards the free list. They said, "That is all right; we have made no mistakes there," and so they left to the man whose product was on the free list no avenue of relief. There was no door to which he could go and knock and ask for help. As I wrote to my friend in the cement business, he must grin and bear it until we have an opportunity to treat him fairly by allowing a protective rate on cement.

It seems to me that the omission of a method of benefiting the free list has worked a great injustice to the brick, cement, monumental stone, cedar shingle, and calf-leather industries, all of whom find themselves on the free list.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Has the gentleman any idea when we will have another revision of the tariff?

Mr. CROWTHER. I will tell the gentleman this: We will have a revision of the tariff in about 1929, after we elect a Republican President and a Republican House and Senate. Then we will have a revision of the tariff.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Have we not a Republican President, a Republican House and Senate now?

Mr. CROWTHER. No. We have a majority in the House; sometimes we have a good majority, but some of them run away from us occasionally and vote with you gentlemen on the Democratic side, and we surely have not a Republican majority in the Senate.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman consider Herbert Hoover a Republican?

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, I did not intend to bring Mr. Hoover's name into this discussion, but Mr. Hoover has declared his faith in a protective tariff on more than one occasion.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman is my expert on the Republican side, and I follow him.

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, I want to say to the gentleman that there has been considerable doubt expressed regarding his political faith, but inasmuch as he has occupied a Cabinet position for nearly eight years under two Republican Presidents and has served his country in a tremendously creditable manner, it seems to me that by this time he should be recognized as a Simon Pure.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman is not infallible on that, is he?

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, no; and I am approaching presidential nominations with an open mind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from New York hope to get rid of these 14 Republican Senators in 1928?

Mr. CROWTHER. Their constituents will have a voice in that matter, and I am not certain that the distinguished Members the gentleman from Alabama refers to will all be candidates in 1928.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman believes in representative form of government and believes in the will of the majority ruling, as expressed through their elected representatives?

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, yes; but I hope that during the intervening period between now and election they may give prayerful consideration to the facts and awake to a realization of their duties as Republicans.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And unless the prayer is effective the gentleman wants to stand pat?

Mr. CROWTHER. One or the other. I am a good deal like the Puritans, who said they trusted in God but wanted to keep their powder dry.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The gentleman spoke about not getting any revision of the tariff until 1929, or until the country elected a Republican President and a Republican House and Senate; is it not a fact that to-day the Democrats are in favor of a revision of the tariff?

Mr. CROWTHER. Downward.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Very well; but we are in favor of a revision of the tariff.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; downward.

Mr. ALLGOOD. So, does not the gentleman think there will be a better chance of getting a revision of the tariff by electing a Democratic President and a Democratic House and Senate rather than to elect a Republican administration?

Mr. CROWTHER. I will say to the gentleman it is not always for the good of the country when the Democrats revise the tariff or when they write a tariff bill; several such instances are on record.

Mr. ALLGOOD. But the gentleman wants the tariff revised.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; the way Republicans revise it—for the protection of the industries of the country. You Democrats are now expressing great solicitude for the farmer and declaring that the tariff is of no benefit to him. When you wrote the Underwood bill what did you do for the farmer?

Here is the way you treated the farmers that so many of you people are so earnest in your protestations regarding the welfare of. This list has been printed before, but it can not be printed too often. I have here the deadly parallel columns, and they show what trifling consideration you had for the farmers when you wrote a tariff bill. Here is a list of the products:

The tariff levy under the Underwood and Fordney Acts

Product	Underwood free trade, 1913	Fordney protective act, 1922
Beef and fresh veal	Free	3 cents per pound.
Cattle weighing less than 1,050 pounds each.	do	1½ cents per pound.
Cattle weighing over 1,050 pounds each.	do	2 cents per pound.
Lamb and mutton	do	Lamb, 4 cents per pound; mutton, 2½ cents per pound.

The tariff levy under the Underwood and Fordney Acts—Continued

Product	Underwood free trade, 1913	Fordney protective act, 1922
Bacon and ham, fresh, prepared, or preserved.	Free	2 cents per pound.
Meats	do	20 per cent.
Cream	do	20 cents per gallon.
Milk	do	2½ cents per gallon.
Eggs	do	8 cents per dozen.
Horses and mules	10 per cent	$30 per head.
Barley	15 cents per bushel	20 cents per bushel.
Buckwheat	Free	10 cents per hundredweight
Corn	do	15 cents per bushel.
Oats	6 cents per bushel	Do.
Rye	Free	Do.
Wheat	do	42 cents per bushel.
Apples	10 cents per bushel	25 cents per bushel.
Cherries	do	$1 per bushel.
Cider	2 cents per gallon	5 cents per gallon.
Peaches and pears	10 cents per bushel	25 cents per bushel.
Butter	2½ cents per pound	12 cents per pound.
Beans, green	25 cents per bushel	30 cents per bushel.
Beans, dried	do	$1.05 per bushel.
Peas, dried or green	10 cents per bushel	60 cents per bushel.
Onions	20 cents per bushel	57 cents per bushel.
Potatoes	Free	30 cents per bushel.
Hay	$2 per ton	$4 per ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The gentleman is now bringing an accusation against his own party because they will not revise the tariff, and I do not see how the gentleman can hold out any hope of any revision of the tariff through Republican rule in this country.

Mr. CROWTHER. No; I do not bring any accusation against my party. I am bringing an accusation against the gentleman's party when it wrote the Underwood tariff bill. You failed to do the very thing you are now asking us and hounding us to do, when you had the opportunity.

You had a chance to do something for the farmer, but you did not give him any consideration. Your leader at that time brought in a bill and said, "Here is a bill without an ounce of protection." That statement was afterwards modified by some of the Members, who said that when they wrote such a bill it could not help but result in "incidental" protection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. But the farmers were not going broke during the Democratic régime.

Mr. CROWTHER. During the Democratic régime nobody was broke in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A bloody World War raised a tariff barrier higher than Republicans would have constructed, for it was a virtual embargo. We were raising billions in Liberty loans, while the manhood of European nations were being taken away from their firesides in order that they might fight and protect their homes and protect their government. Then our boys marched away to end the conflict. We were supplying the world, as well as our own people and our Army with foodstuffs and necessities of every character. That was an artificial condition that had no bearing at all on the tariff situation. Nobody knows what would have happened to the country under the Underwood-Simmons bill if it had not been for the war. The war was your very salvation.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. But after the war was over and when the ill effects of the Underwood tariff law commenced to have an effect, immediately all agricultural prices went down because of the importation of agricultural products; and then the farmers did begin to go broke.

Mr. CROWTHER. Exactly.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We passed an emergency tariff law and put a tariff on everything they raised.

Mr. CROWTHER. Let me say there is really no need of getting unusually excited about the tariff discussion, because, gentlemen, it does not make any difference what political party is in power we are going to have a tariff bill just the same. [Applause.] The bills may vary somewhat as regards the rates and as regards the various commodities on the free list, but we are going to have a tariff bill.

You have tried your hand at writing one or two, and I think you have learned something, probably; and the change of heart which is exhibited here to-day shows that if you wrote a new one you would have considerably more consideration for the farmer than you had when you wrote the Underwood bill.

As I have said, there is no need of getting excited about it; but what has concerned me very considerably is this: When the committee of Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee go into executive session to write a tariff bill I feel like asking them this question: "You are about to enter upon a project to which you are unalterably opposed, which your great leaders have declared unconstitutional. Do you still believe this?"

Within the last few years one of them withdrew that statement. Your great President Wilson withdrew, I believe, the statement that it was unconstitutional. Now that you are going to write a tariff bill, let me ask you this question: "You are unalterably opposed to the project; you really believe—some of you, at least—that it is unconstitutional and ought not to be done; now, tell me how you write your duties, by what process of analysis or deduction do you come to conclusions that allow you to write the rates into your tariff bill?" Do not tell me you do it to produce revenue, because no six of your men on this side agree as to how much revenue ought to be produced; and I shall ask if a duty on rice and goat hair is for revenue purposes. I have heard it stated here that $300,000,000 seems to be the peak limit, and then I heard another Democrat get up and deny that, and say that he had never made such a statement. I think it was the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], who now sits before me. So I ask, "Upon what basis do you draw these deductions?"

Mr. MADDEN. What was the peak of $300,000,000?

Mr. CROWTHER. Many prominent Democrats have thought that was about as much as we ought to take in as a matter of revenue at the customhouses.

Mr. MADDEN. That is more than we ever took in under any of their tariff proposals, but we have been taking in over $600,000,000 since then.

Mr. CROWTHER. Absolutely; and if you believe in a tariff for revenue you Democrats ought to get up and shout three times a day for the Fordney-McCumber bill, because it has been the greatest revenue producer the country has ever known; that is, if you are honest in your contention and belief in a tariff bill for revenue.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The gentleman has been asking the question as to how Democrats write tariff bills. Would the gentleman kindly explain to the House how Republicans write them?

Mr. CROWTHER. If the gentleman will answer my question, I will answer his.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Do not these great corporations write the schedules themselves?

Mr. CROWTHER. No; the gentleman and I had that argument on the floor before. He then promised that he would put the proof in the RECORD, and I said I hoped the gentleman would not forget to place the proof in the RECORD, and he said he would not, but he never has put it in. His memory is so poor that we have never seen them.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Did not the steel lobyists write the steel schedule, did not the woolen people come here and write the woolen schedule, did not the cotton people come here and write the cotton schedule? I say they did.

Mr. CROWTHER. That statement is an insult to the Members of the Ways and Means Committee. That statement is not a statement of fact. The gentleman from Arkansas has no right to belittle the manhood of a committee of this House like the Ways and Means Committee by any such charge as that. I say that for the benefit of the Democratic Members as well as the Republicans. It may be that a charge of that kind would meet approbation in the gentleman's territory, but not here.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Everybody knows that people who want a tariff on goods come here and write the schedules.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, no; the gentleman offered to produce proof of that and put it in the RECORD, but he has never done it.

Such statements are utter nonsense; when you Democrats write a tariff bill you write it, and when the Republicans write a tariff bill they write it. You can not fool the people with such bunk as that. You may get away with that kind of a speech in Arkansas, but it will not meet with a very warm reception in any other State in the Union.

CALF LEATHER

Now, we have the calf-leather industry, and 40,000,000 pounds of kip and calf leather came in last year. The calf-leather tanners do not know how much longer they can hold out. This product is on the free list.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman from New York thinks the tariff needs revision?

Mr. CROWTHER. I do.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Are we going to revise it at this session?

Mr. CROWTHER. No; the President has expressed himself on several occasions as opposed to revision at this time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Can not the Congress do something even if the President is against it?

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say it would be extremely unwise to touch the tariff at this session, because it would take six or seven months to do it. You can go into the smoking room and revise the tariff in 10 minutes, you can revise it conversationally walking from here to the House Office Building; but it takes the Committee on Ways and Means, the Finance Committee of the Senate, and Congress six or seven months of hard work after complete hearings and the help of the Tariff Commission to draft a tariff bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There are certain glaring rates there out of tune with the present situation confessedly. The gentleman mentions competition. If you can keep out that foreign competition by raising the rates and improving the situation in America, why do not you do it?

Mr. CROWTHER. We can not do it now.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Take that one schedule. Why not offer an amendment to the present law?

Mr. CROWTHER. Because under the rules of the House that opens up the whole bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Then let us open it up.

Mr. CROWTHER. You can not do it. It can not be done under the present circumstances. You gentlemen have good political sense. It is your political sense that keeps you prodding us continually on this subject.

Mr. GREENWOOD. If it is a good thing for America, if it needs to be raised, raise it, and if the rates need to be lowered, lower them; but let us not close the door, in view of the gentleman's argument that the rates need adjustment.

Mr. CROWTHER. If the gentleman was in the same position at this time, he would not open the tariff bill. It is a great advantage to be in the minority because you can be like blazes for something that you do not really want. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. I say that if I had anything to do with it I would open it up, and if it needs raising I would raise the duty.

Mr. CROWTHER. That is good Republican doctrine, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana will help us when the opportunity presents itself.

Here is another industry, the cement industry, that got somehow or other on the free list in 1922. A man 40 miles from me who has $4,000,000 invested in a plant said to me the other day that he is faced with a shutdown for the first time in 19 years. Why? Because cement is coming into America at such a tremendously low rate from Belgium, France, and England that he can not meet the competition. They have what they call chalk beds over there in those countries, where they just put those gigantic steam shovels in and take it out of the side of the hill and put it into barrels. If you want to go into the cement business in the United States, the first most necessary possession is a limestone quarry with an inexhaustible supply.

You have to grind that limestone with tremendously expensive crushing machinery, and by the time you get that limestone down to the same consistency as these people take it out with the steam shovel, which costs 5 cents a barrel in that country, you have been put to an expense of 29.4 cents a barrel in the United States. They are bringing the cement over to the southeastern ports of the country at a freight rate of 10 cents a barrel. The rate from Glens Falls, N. Y., to New England is 54 cents a barrel. The cement producers are on the free list, and they have no avenue of escape.

In five years more than 9,000,000 barrels of foreign cement have been brought into this country duty free. Briefly, the direct losses to American prosperity can be accounted for as follows:

Domestic labor lost in wages	$8,876,387
American railroads lost in business amounting to	6,336,623
Coal mines lost sales totaling	1,741,387
Textile mills and cotton growers lost business amounting to	528,326
Machine shops and foundries lost sales amounting to	3,465,000
Domestic cement industry lost sales amounting to	16,132,152

These represent only the major and direct losses. What these importations cost the country as a whole in stagnated business due to depleted buying power and loss of confidence on the part of investors can only be conjectured.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If I understand the gentleman's position with reference to the protective tariff, it is that he would produce everything in this country that we could produce and would not import anything that can be produced in this country?

Mr. CROWTHER. I should favor such a proposal.

Mr. TREADWAY. And would not the gentleman prefer that to not having any of our industries employed in this country, everything being brought in under a Democratic administration, at such rates as would paralyze industry?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes. I think I can agree to both of those conclusions without any inconsistency. Mr. Chairman, there is another idea that I try to express to the people among whom I live and everywhere I go. We talk considerably in this country about patriotism and about the making of patriotic speeches and the waving of the flag. I think the most loyal and patriotic thing that Mr. and Mrs. American Citizen can do is when they need either a luxury or a necessity in their home to see to it that they buy something with a label on it "Made in the United States of America," where a decent pay envelope is handed out on Saturday night for an honest week's work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want to read something now that explains my sentiment and the issue very clearly. This was written by Thomas Jefferson. Some very wonderful Democrats have written observations in favor of the policy of protection and this is only a little different, but it happens that it expresses my sentiment in this respect:

> The prohibiting duties we lay on all articles of foreign manufacture, which prudence requires us to establish at home, with the patriotic determination of every good citizen to use no foreign article which can be made within ourselves, without regard to difference in price, secures us against a relapse into foreign dependency.

That is pretty good Republican doctrine, written by a great Democrat; and it is pretty sound, patriotic American doctrine.

Next we have the cedar-shingle industry that you have heard so much about. They are also on the free list, and I understand there have been 5,000 of their shingles sent here. I do not know whether they are to spank the Republicans or the Democrats. Anyway, they are here.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think they are to spank the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. TREADWAY. And they came two in a bunch.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; to spank both. But there has been such dereliction on the part of the Democratic Members on several occasions that it warrants more than one spanking.

Mr. OLDFIELD. But the gentleman will admit that the Democrats have been voting in the committee to open up the tariff bill and the Republicans have not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And looking at the size of some of the Republicans on the Committee on Ways and Means it occurs to me that it will probably require more than one shingle to spank them.

Mr. CROWTHER. And if the punishment was made to fit the crime, two shingles would not be too many when properly applied to the Democrats.

Bricks are also on the free list. Common brick imports have increased from 2,600,000 in 1923 to 114,345,000 in 1926. They come in largely from Belgium, and are shipped as ballast, with no freight charge, only a loading and unloading charge. Let me say that great as is the necessity, in many cases I believe it would be political and industrial suicide to attempt to revise the tariff at this time. You would upset the whole business of the country and industry would not know "where it was at."

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is, then, for political reasons?

Mr. CROWTHER. No; not wholly for political reasons. It would disrupt business, and nobody can predict what the consequences would be.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If you were to undertake to revise the tariff at this Congress, you would not be able to get the bill you want.

Mr. CROWTHER. You could not secure its passage in the other body, but I think we could do business with you liberal, open-minded Democrats and get the bill through the House. [Laughter and applause.] You were speaking of the things that require spanking. I want to quote here from the Poindexter plan of farm relief. It goes on to say:

> As a noted Senator once said, referring to a distinguished Congressman from Texas in the discussion of the wool schedule of the tariff bill, "that the distinguished Congressman, although he was a Democrat and supposed to be against the tariff, has taken pains to secure in the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill thorough protection for his Angora goats, while he left the Rocky Mountain ram to face the wintry blasts of a Wyoming winter without protection."

[Laughter.]

Now you see there is use occasionally for the shingle, and it is not always on one side of the House. [Laughter.]

I call your attention to a page from the magazine called "The Farmer," that came to me. I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks by inserting this article and some important letters that I have received from time to time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks, including the articles referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. He says in this article—

We do not produce our surplus. We import it.

If you will read it, you will find a great deal of substance and truth in the article. It says:

It has been taken for granted ever since the price smash of 1921 that American farmers were producing the surplus which has depressed their markets. They have been exhorted from all quarters to whoa up production—by college professors and Congressmen, by newspaper writers, bankers, market experts, and wagonloads of miscellaneous statisticians.

In ignoring this advice farmers have again proved their sound judgment. For the surplus which has plagued them since the war, which pesters them now, and which will continue to make trouble until it is taken firmly in hand, does not come chiefly from American farms.

Most of the fraction too much of soil stuffs which overloads our markets and lowers prices is brought into American markets from all the far corners of the earth.

A few men have seen this all along. One of them is Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover, who has summed up the matter in the statement that we are importing farm products which we could produce ourselves to the tune of $1,000,000,000 a year. Certain things, like coffee, rubber, and probably to some extent sugar, we can not produce and must continue to buy abroad. But these are the smallest part of our huge import total.

Let's open our minds to the full meaning of this situation. What it signifies is that in just the last few years 2,000,000 American farm folks have been thrown out of their homes, forced off the land into the towns and cities to make a market here in this country for peanut oil and low-grade eggs from China, for cocoanut oil from the Philippines, cattle hides from Argentina, cheese from Italy and Switzerland, wool from Australia, silk from Japan, and flax, fruit, vegetables, rice, nuts, and many other products from up and down the wide earth.

It isn't only that we have imported $1,000,000,000 worth of such things which have taken the place of products from our own farms, but the competition of these imports in our home markets has lowered the price there of every farm product from alfalfa to oranges. It has forced us to export heavily to foreign markets, which has cheapened our entire farm output.

Doubtless the total loss thus inflicted on American farmers would have kept the families on the land that have been squeezed off, besides adding to the prosperity of those who have survived this competition.

We import, for instance, hundreds of millions of pounds of vegetable oils every year. Add our big cheese imports to the portion of these oils that is made into butter substitutes and it means the displacement of about 800,000 cows that might be making a home market for alfalfa, corn, and other feeds.

Say that this dairy opportunity was saved to American farmers. Say also that they were given a part of the sugar-beet market, now narrowed by our annual import of 8,000,000 pounds of sugar, along with a home demand for the wool clip of 26,000,000 sheep and the egg yield of several million hens, both of which products we now buy abroad yearly in those amounts. Given these added outlets, farmers in single-crop regions, as in the Wheat Belt, could balance up their business pretty profitably.

Here is a chance for the politicians who have been preaching farm diversification to bring it about. Let Congress shut out the foreign competition that prevents farmers from raising more of a great many products.

Vegetable-oil imports replace hog fat as well as butter, cheapening hogs and forcing us to find lower-priced foreign markets for much pork production.

Tomato growers are feeling the pinch of annual imports from Italy of over 80,000,000 pounds of canned tomatoes—one-sixth as much as our total home output—along with 18,000,000 pounds of Italian tomato paste. And other vegetables are also being imported in large and growing quantities.

If space allowed, the list might be greatly extended. It all points a simple way to bring in some real farm relief—provide a tariff that will shut out these unnecessary imports, or at least lift the price of them high enough to give American farmers a competitive chance.

Let us open our minds to the full meaning of the situation. I read:

Fully 50 per cent of the cedar mills now remaining in business are in reality bankrupt and are only continuing because creditors refuse to accept them in payment of debts or are struggling on in the hope Congress will soon right the wrongs done to American labor, business, and industry.

REVENUE LOSSES

By reason of the free and unrestricted importation of shingles and cedar lumber the United States Government is annually losing more than $2,000,000, which of a right should be collected as a fair import tax as a consideration for the marked privileges British Columbia manufacturers enjoy in American markets, as well as to equalize production conditions between British Columbia and the United States.

Canadian manufacturers have just as free access to American markets as do Americans, but they pay no American taxes and in no way share our governmental expenses, and are therefore even more privileged in our own American markets than are American manufacturers. It is only fair that foreign manufacturers who enjoy American markets should bear a fair share of governmental expenses incident to the maintenance of such markets.

AMERICAN COMMERCE LOSSES

It would have been easy for the Tariff Commission to have ascertained the approximate losses to American labor and business resulting from the free importation of shingles and cedar lumber to the United States and the forcing of American labor into direct and unrestricted competition with orientals. The commission could have found that the annual importation of shingles and cedar lumber amounted to more than $12,000,000. It could have shown American labor lost the wages paid for the production of such finished products, and that American business lost the increased commerce incident to so large an increased pay roll. Annual labor idleness should rightly have received due notice in the report.

It is conservative to estimate that American labor is annually deprived of the right to earn an additional $10,000,000 in wages and that American business is annually curtailed more than $50,000,000 because of the free and unrestricted importation of shingles and cedar lumber to American markets, in addition to the deprivations and hardships imposed by idleness and unemployment of labor.

The commission should have pointed out that the existing tariff law affords actual and positive protection to oriental labor in British Columbia and to a foreign industry, because it operates directly to force manufacture in a foreign country, to the detriment of American labor, industry, and business.

Here is a letter that I have received:

(Tariff committee: N. C. Jamison, Jamison Lumber & Shingle Co.; W. C. McMaster, John McMaster Shingle Co.; W. C. Schultheis, Seattle Cedar Lumber Co.; George Bergstrom, C. B. Lumber & Shingle Co.; E. UNITED STATES CEDAR INDUSTRY, Everett, Wash., January 3, 1928.

Hon. FRANK CROWTHER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Our present tariff act charges an import tax on logs when imported to American mills for manufacture by American workmen, grants free and unlimited exportation of American logs to foreign countries, and admits free and unrestricted importation of shingles and cedar lumber to all United States markets.

Canada charges an export tax on logs, rigidly restricts log exportations, and at times completely prohibits shipment of Canadian logs to American mills. Canadian sales and import taxes practically bar all American shingles and cedar lumber from Canadian markets.

Such laws afford actual United States tariff protection to British Columbia shingles and cedar-lumber production; they give the oriental labor of Canada a legislative preference over American cedar workers; they operate to afford a practical subsidy to British Columbia production of shingles and cedar lumber; and just as effectually penalize American labor and industry for attempting to produce cedar products on American soil.

This congressional act has already exterminated more than 50 per cent of the productive capacity of the American red-cedar shingle industry. Fully 50 per cent of all remaining American cedar mills are practically bankrupt and certain of early failure unless relief is promptly granted by Congress from these congressionally discriminatory conditions.

These extreme conditions are forced on the American cedar industry and American labor through an act of Congress. They are unjust, unfair, un-American, and contrary to the pledges and promises of all political parties; they constitute an indisputable wrong of Congress against American labor and industry and of a right should be speedily corrected.

We are inclosing an industry statement showing our distressed condition. We are begging for correction of this congressional wrong, so that our industry may not be further exterminated nor our labor more completely pauperized, and that American business may not be needlessly stagnated. Being Americans we are at least entitled to an equal chance in the production of American products for American consumption. That is all we ask.

Yours very truly,

A. C. EDWARDS,
Tariff Committee Chairman.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Are you going to say in the coming campaign that the McCumber-Fordney tariff bill failed to give you adequate protection?

Mr. CROWTHER. No. But I say that if the rates had been as high as they should have been we would have had no trouble. But our party and the committee did the very best they could under the circumstances, and we have had an unusually long period of real prosperity.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It was the fault of your committee?

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, no. If the gentleman from Texas had come into the committee and looked at some of the rates that were suggested, and that would have been truly protective, he would have laughed at them, and said that they were absurd. Many industries are suffering because they were put on the free list, and others are suffering because of the return of great industrial progress abroad. Let me read this to you before the gentleman from Alabama interrupts me:

SAYING IT WITHOUT FLOWERS

Our former ambassador to Germany during the Wilson administration, James W. Gerard, speaking as a citizen at large, uses strong words in reference to the attitude of Europe toward the United States. He says:

"The only way the United States of America can defeat the hatred of European nations toward us is to maintain the strongest fleet, Army, and air force in the world."

These are the words of a man who earned the confidence of the country in most trying times. In a public address last week he said, "Europe is boiling," and that knowing us to be economically rich, and resenting our immigration restrictions, as well as our protective tariff, "they hate us," as shown by the proposal in the league council to act against commercial supremacy—a "direct slap" at the United States.

Speaking as a Democrat, Mr. Gerard says:

"Germany is now ready for producing goods on a scale greater than any other foreign nation. A high tariff is the only protection the United States has to offer, for, if it is lowered, the high-wage American worker will meet the direct competition of the low-waged German. As a Democrat, I think it impossible to change the present tariff."

There is some degree of inconsistency in the attitude of many of the Democratic brethren who are strong advocates of restrictive immigration but are quite willing to let the goods manufactured by these peoples come in free of duty.

[Cries of "No! no!" on the Democratic side.]

Oh, well, if not free, you want a very low rate of duty on them, do you not?

Mr. GREENWOOD. We want to adjust some of these duties which we think are not right.

Mr. CROWTHER. No; the first thing the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] would do would be to take off the duty on aluminum. You would not have heard so much about aluminum had not the Secretary of the Treasury happened to be interested in it. It would not have been mentioned otherwise, and it is only mentioned to show personal animus. The fact is that the American housewife can buy aluminum utensils at a remarkably low price, and aluminum ware is rapidly displacing tinware in the household.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask this question in absolute good faith: What consideration does the gentleman think these western agricultural States are entitled to on this question of the necessity for a revision of the tariff, as expressed by the votes of their representatives in the Senate of the United States, when they voted deliberately for a resolution at this session of Congress saying that agriculture is prostrate in their section of the country, and they believe one of the reasons for the depression is on account of the unfair proportion of tariff rates? They passed a resolution and 14 Republican Senators, at least nominally, voted for that resolution. Does not the gentleman think as a Republican that those farmers in that great expanse of country are honestly represented through the expression of their Senators when they say they need some reduction in the tariff?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman four additional minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I feel toward the parties the gentleman refers to as many members of the Democratic Party felt toward Grover Cleveland at one time, and as many of them felt toward William Jennings Bryan a few years later. That is my answer to that question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether that is fair or not.

Mr. CROWTHER. I think it is perfectly fair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know it is in contravention of the rules to say anything about the vote of a Senator, but Senator CAPPER, Senator BORAH, Senator NORRIS, and some others—who have certainly heretofore had the brand of Republicanism upon them—voted for that resolution.

Mr. CROWTHER. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama that it is probably an infraction of the rules to discuss the votes of Senators. I am of the opinion, however, that the distinguished Members at the other end of the Capitol are certainly well enough acquainted with the constitutional prerogatives of this House to know that no such legislation as that had the right to be initiated in that body.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And they recognized that constitutional prerogative.

Mr. CROWTHER. No; they did not recognize it. They failed to recognize it; but that, no doubt, meets with the approval of the gentleman from Alabama, and meets with the probation of most Members on his side, because anything that looks like a disturbing factor among Republicans meets with your earnest approval. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Are we to infer from the gentleman's remarks that he believes the economic conditions throughout the country are not good?

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, they are not as good as they might be.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Then there is not general prosperity under Republican administration.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, I think the country is generally prosperous, but there are very many spots that are bad; but let me say to the gentleman that in the spots where conditions are bad and where industry is lagging, it is because they have not sufficient tariff protection and due to the keen competition with foreign-made goods. That is the reason we have these conditions—too many foreign goods on our store counters—and the tariff should not be revised downward; but it should be revised upward in order to keep these goods out of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CANFIELD] such time as he desires.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am going to take just a few minutes of your time to discuss a question that I feel is not only of great importance to the farmers of the country but to the average business man and laboring man as well. The question I refer to is farm legislation, and, ladies and gentlemen, it should be given consideration by this body without delay. We should face it squarely and cease trying to prolong or dodge it, as it seems to me this body is trying to do.

Every Member of this House knows the farmers are not getting a square deal, and why a deaf ear should be turned to their demands for right and justice I personally can not understand. This body should not only be anxious to pass farm legislation in the interest of our farmers but in the interest of all business and labor, for while our farmers are held down as they are now, and have been for several years, their purchasing power is gone, and this hurts both business and labor.

We have in this country 35,000,000 of our population feeding the other 80,000,000. Thirty-five million held down merely because the question of devising and applying the proper remedy has not been taken care of by those that have the power to act. The buying power of 35,000,000 people practically cut off because the farmers are not given the consideration they so justly deserve.

The farmers have been assured for several years by both the Democrats and Republicans that they would be given consideration; and if there was ever a promise made to any group of men that should be fulfilled, it is the one that has been made to the farmers of the country.

We are told by those that oppose farm legislation that farm depression can not be helped by passing a law that will help take care of the surplus. To this my answer is: Big business is able to make their business profitable by controlling production and surplus, and our farmers can likewise be put in position to make a profit if they can control production and surplus, but without the aid of the Government they as a body are not able to organize in a way that this can be carried out, and what we as Members of Congress must do during this session of Congress is to pass a law that will enable them to control production and surplus as big business, through organization, is doing, and then the men that till the soil, working as they do, many of them 16 to 18 hours a day, can and will be able to get a fair return on the money they have invested and for the efforts they put forth. [Applause.]

True, I know there are Members in this body who are trying to sidetrack this question by saying, "Why pass a surplus control bill when the President will not sign it?" My answer to this is we as Members are answerable only for ourselves. It is our duty to do everything we can to see that farm legislation that will be helpful to the farmers is considered and passed without delay, and if the President in his wisdom feels it is his duty to veto such a measure and deprive the farmers of what is justly do them, that is up to him and not up to us as Members of Congress; and gentlemen of the House, I do hope that we can depend on the Members on the Republican side that are interested in helpful farm legislation to vote with those of us on the Democratic side of the House, as you did last year, so that farm legislation that will really help the farmer can be passed; and if the President wants to veto this measure, let him veto it; and if this is done, let us hope there are enough Members in this body that have studied this question and understand it that will vote to pass the measure over his veto so that our farmers can get the consideration they so justly deserve.

I know we have some Members in this body that feel that our farmers can only be given consideration by reducing the tariff, and, I am sorry to say, we have a few back in the district I have the honor to represent that feel that way—men who have given little or no study to the question and do not know what this great question is all about. Gentlemen, I would welcome the opportunity to vote for a reduction on tariff rates that are too high, and I know if we could reduce some tariff rates it would help our farmers, but I also realize that we have as much chance to reduce tariff rates during this session of Congress as we have to build a fence around the moon, so why not get together and pass farm legislation that can and will help the farmers of the country?

We have others that say the only way to help the farmers is to reduce freight rates on agricultural products. Freight rates should be reduced, but we all know there is no chance at the present time to have them reduced.

By investigation we find that the farmers in Canada have much lower freight rates than the farmers in our own country. Wheat growers in sparsely settled Canada have an advantage of from 8 to 10 cents a bushel over our own farmers. We know this should not be; we know that freight rates on agricultural products should be reduced, but we also know that under an administration that is owned and controlled by the moneyed interests there is no chance on earth to get a reduction on freight rates. So why let the impossible prevent us from doing what we can do by getting together and passing helpful farm legislation?

Laws have been passed that are helpful to the big interests of America. Laws have been passed that are helpful to the laborers of America; and why is it, ladies and gentlemen of this great body, that when it comes to our farmers nothing has been done for them?

It is only natural that those that are especially aided by laws enacted in their favor will forge to the front and those that are not able to get legislation that will be helpful to them will have to drop back.

At the present time we have our high protective laws, which allow the big interests to receive higher than fair prices for their products. Labor has been able to have restricted immigration laws passed—and I feel it is right that they should—which has enabled labor to ask higher prices than labor receives in any other country on the globe; but our poor farmers, who a few years ago were asked to produce all they possibly could, are to-day producing a surplus which must be sold; and the trouble is that the surplus must be sold on the world market; and the price the surplus brings determines the price of everything he has to sell.

Therefore some way must be devised to control the surplus produced so that the surplus will not set the price on the entire crop produced as it is doing at the present time.

In the President's message to the Seventieth Congress he made specific recommendation on agricultural legislation. You will remember the President recommended a Federal board and a revolving loan fund at a moderate rate of interest for the necessary financing. As I have said before on this floor, the farmers do not want to borrow any more money; what they want is a price for what they produce, so they can pay off what they already have borrowed. They want to get a price for what they have to sell, so they can pay off their mortgages and keep their homes, that many of them have worked a lifetime to be able to call their own, only to come to a time when they will have to give up everything they have if something is not done to relieve the present depressed agricultural condition.

The majority of the farm organizations of the country are united on what should be done to stabilize agriculture and have agreed that it can be done only by passing legislation that will control the surplus.

On November 27 and 28, 1927, a large number of the leading farm and cooperative marketing organizations met here in Washington to consider the legislation to be recommended at this session of Congress, and at this meeting they authorized the following statement:

A conference representing farm organizations and cooperative associations of the country has been held to consider the farm legislative situation prior to the opening of the session of Congress.

Throughout the meeting there has been complete accord among the farm groups on the principles of legislation for which they will contend. As in the past, they will ask for national legislation to enable farm cooperative organizations to control and manage crop surpluses in the best interests of the producers. The need for such legislation is generally admitted, and the position of these farm groups is definite. There has been no change in the position of the farm organizations represented in respect to the principles of legislation rendered. They want no Government price fixing or Government subsidies, direct or indirect. On the contrary, they insist that such legislation, to be effective, must require each marketed unit of a commodity to pay its share of the costs of its own stabilization and protection.

The group conferred with Senator MCNARY on Monday. It was especially emphasized in the meeting with the Senator that subsidy of any sort is not desirable in farm legislation, but that the principle of spreading the overhead cost of centralized surplus-control operations over all the commodity benefited is the best and soundest method yet proposed.

On November 14, 1927, the Corn Belt federations of farm organizations of the entire farm belt met at Des Moines, Iowa, and passed the following resolutions:

Meeting on the eve of the convening of the Seventieth Congress, the Corn Belt committee, speaking for more than a million and a half organized farmers, hereby renews its demand for the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill, and serves notice that it will accept no compromise which weakens or destroys any of the fundamental provisions of this bill.

Especially will we reject with scorn any measure which does not contain the equalization fee in untrammeled form, and this because this provision constitutes the very heart of the surplus-control problem and must become the basis of any agricultural policy which in the years to come will assure the producers of wheat, cotton, pork, tobacco, rice, and other surplus farm commodities of a dollar of 100 cents purchasing power.

The tragic toll of the existing agricultural situation finds proof in the fact that since the close of the World War the farm debt of the United States has increased from four and one-half billion dollars to twelve and one-half billion dollars and in a shrinkage of farm values of all kinds in the appalling sum of $20,000,000,000.

It is found in the further fact that while still constituting more than 25 per cent of the Nation's population, the 30,000,000 people of the farms are receiving less than 10 per cent of the national income.

With a condition so deep seated and menacing there can be no honorable compromise.

We are merely asking that the farm dollar shall equal in purchasing power the dollar of those who fix the farmers' cost of production, and less than this means peasantry.

We repeat, therefore, that we will scornfully reject any proposal which does not meet this great problem fairly and honestly.

On the same date, November 14, 1927, the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America held its national convention in Des Moines, Iowa, and passed the following resolutions:

The National Farmers' Union in their twenty-third annual session hereby affirms its confidence in the principles of the McNary-Haugen bill, and we pledge our full and hearty support to the fight in behalf of its passage. We shall not tolerate any vital changes in the provisions of the bill, such as the equalization fee and farm-organization control. We deeply resent assumed authority on the part of certain business and political organizations to initiate and sponsor farm-relief legislation.

On December 5, 6, and 7, 1927, the American Farm Bureau Federation held its ninth annual meeting in Chicago and adopted without a dissenting vote the following on farm legislation:

We appreciate the actions of the Sixty-ninth Congress, which, in a nonpartisan manner, passed the surplus control bill. If put into operation this measure would have marked the beginning of a sound economic agricultural policy in our Nation.

Commodity marketing and surplus control are inseparable. Cooperative organizations, however, can not bear the load unaided. Under certain conditions in order that operations may be successful the entire commodity marketed and not the member producers alone must, by the application of the equalization-fee principle, meet the requirement that each marketed unit shall pay its share in the cost of its own stabilization and protection.

We insist that legislation which contains the principles embodied in the McNary-Haugen bill with such improvements as experience and good judgment may suggest shall again be passed by Congress.

In addition to these meetings held by the farmers themselves there have been many other meetings that have passed similar resolutions demanding that this Congress pass legislation that will be helpful to agriculture. The reestablishment of a sound agricultural condition is demanded, and rightly so, by the farmers of the country, and this body should act, and that without delay.

The United States is the world's greatest agricultural nation, and to-day those engaged in farming are the least prosperous. About one-third of the population are engaged in farming. Agriculture is receiving about $12,000,000,000 as its total income, while the total national income is $90,000,000,000; or, in other words, the one-third of the population that is engaged in farming are receiving $12,000,000,000 and the other two-thirds of the population $78,000,000,000. The farming population receives one-eighth and the other two-thirds seven-eighths of the total national income. With these facts confronting us we can not help but realize that there is bound to be depression in the agricultural sections and there will continue to be depression until something is done to make it possible for the farmer to receive a fair price for what he has to sell.

Ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the great question that confronts us as Members of this body is, Are we going to continue our high-tariff policy to help the manufacturing interests and our restricted immigration policy to help organized labor without giving any attention whatever to our farmers; or are we going to pass legislation, without delay, that will put our farmers in a class with those that have already been given consideration by this body? This is a vital question, ladies and gentlemen, and if those of you who are interested in keeping a high tariff for industry and those of you who feel that organized labor should hold the standing it now has are not willing to help those of us who feel that it is time that our farmers should have legislation that will be helpful to them, it is time for the Members of this body who are interested in seeing that the farmers of this country are given consideration to stand as a body until right and justice is given to the farmer. [Applause.]

At the present time the balance between agriculture and industry is out of all reason. The permanent well-being of the future is threatened. Legislation that will be helpful to the farmers must be passed. Something must be done that will bring agriculture up to the high standard given to others. As it now stands, the farmer is the victim of injustice, and that injustice must be removed.

I understand the Labor Bureau, Incorporated, has given out a report that there are 4,000,000 laboring men out of employment. Think of it! 4,000,000 laboring men out of employment, and the heads of the present administration trying to make everyone think there is prosperity on every hand. How they get by with such statements I can not understand, for everyone knows that outside of a few special privileged manufacturers that are enabled to enjoy prosperity through the special privilege given them by the present high tariff there is a general depression everywhere, business men and banks going broke almost every day, and more especially in the agricultural districts; and, ladies and gentlemen of this great body, this condition can not improve with one-third of our people being discriminated against. General prosperity can only come when all classes are given a chance to make the purchasing power of their dollar equal to the purchasing power of others.

As I stated before, the purchasing power of our farmer has been cut off; he is forced out of the buying market; business and labor are beginning to feel it, and conditions will continue to get worse unless something is done to equalize the balance that now exists between agriculture and industry.

Ladies and gentlemen, the time has come when something must be done; consideration must be given to this all-important question without further delay, or the depressed condition that is being felt throughout the country will grow gradually worse.

To oppose farm legislation because it is new and has never been tried is nothing but discrimination against the farmer.

The manufacturers of the country have been given their high protective tariff, the railroads their high freight rates, and labor its restricted immigration, all of which has helped to give the farmers of the country a black eye.

I wish it were possible to lower the present highway-robbery tariff that we have on the statute books that is robbing the farmers on every hand. I wish it were possible to reduce the freight rates on agricultural products so that our farmers could move their products at a reasonable cost, but this we all realize can not be done under this administration; but, ladies and gentlemen, we can pass farm legislation that will be helpful to our farmers and thereby not only help the farmers get what is justly due them but the small business man and laboring man who are located in the agricultural sections as well.

Why delay this all-important legislation? Every Member of this body knows that something should be done. Let us do it now, so that farmers can and will be put on an equality with others that have in the past been given the consideration they ask. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER].

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as a member of the subcommittee conducting the hearings on the bill upon which the debate is supposed to be proceeding, the Treasury and Post Office Departments bill, I wish to speak briefly concerning one or two phases of the bill; but before doing that, I may say that in the formulation of this bill and in the conduct of the hearings thereon, the work is very much like the work on the other appropriation bills that come before the Congress. It is intensive in character, and extended. Our own hearings began about the 9th of January and ran without interruption until about the 28th of January. On the post office bill the printed pages of the hearings are about 450. As to the Treasury Department bill, about 950 printed pages are consumed to indicate the testimony adduced, making a total of something like 1,350 pages of printed matter. The two bills are consolidated into a single measure.

In this work our subcommittee has had the invaluable service of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who is also the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. MADDEN. I have counted it a peculiar privilege and honor to serve on this particular subcommittee since I have been a Member of this body, and I think it may not be inappropriate for me to testify concerning something of the work performed by the chairman of the subcommittee, because, after all, he must bear the major burden of the work of the subcommittee. His knowledge, not only of the matters contained in this bill, but his knowledge of matters contained in all the appropriation bills which come before Congress is of a marvelous character, and I feel that the country at large, as well as the two Houses of Congress, owe him a great and everlasting obligation, because he is truly a representative of the taxpayers in this work. [Applause.]

Since the Budget system has been in operation the House Appropriations Committee has been able to scale Budget estimates by more than $350,000,000, and this result has largely been achieved because of the knowledge and judgment of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

In our work we are also assisted by our very competent clerk of the House Appropriations Committee, who is also clerk of the subcommittee, Mr. Sheild. No one can ever quite know the great and important service that is performed by the competent and experienced clerks of these great committees of the two Houses. They are the men behind the scenes, and their work is beyond estimation, so far as its importance is concerned.

I wish to call your attention especially to one or two subjects involved in the bill. Our distinguished chairman himself will at the appropriate time give you the general details set forth in it and in the various estimates which go to make up the many items of the Treasury and Post Office requirements.

I have always been deeply interested in the subject of aviation, and since I have been a member of this subcommittee that subject I have found to be one of absorbing interest. With your indulgence, I wish to submit a few facts and figures evolved in this particular hearing and, incidentally, in the hearings which have gone before since postal aviation has been a vital subject before Congress.

It is very wonderful to see what the growth of aviation has been, and it is very wonderful to note the splendid contribution which the young men of America, in the Army and out of the Army, have made to this great field of enterprise which makes its appeal, and gives its challenge, to the hardihood, to the endurance, to the courage, and to the clean living of the men engaged in it.

Concerning the subject of aviation in the Post Office Department, I may say that one of the most interesting branches of the postal work is the Air Mail Service.

The Postmaster General has properly visualized the possibilities of this field, and Col. Paul Henderson, the immediate predecessor of the present Second Assistant Postmaster General, performed splendid pioneer service in this connection; and it is but fair to say that our subcommittee has, under the wise, constructive leadership of its chairman throughout, recognized the importance of air mails and has cooperated to secure adequate appropriations therefor. It is fair to state also that Mr. Glover, the present Second Assistant, and his aides are carrying on this branch of the service and broadening its scope with wise efficiency.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does this bill further extend the aviation postal service; and if so, in what sections of the country will it be so extended?

Mr. THATCHER. It increases the appropriation for that purpose, and I will touch on that later.

Substantial appropriations were made at the beginning, and within the past three or four years, to enable the Post Office Department itself to engage in the transcontinental carriage of mail by air. The policy was to have the Government demonstrate what could be done in this regard, and thus blaze the way for private enterprise, under contract, to take over this service and to extend it, thus relieving the Government from the investment required and the other hazards involved. This policy has been crowned with success. The Post Office Department has gone out of the business of itself transporting air mail, and private enterprise has taken over the entire work, under contract, and is performing that work efficiently. This is as it should be. Not only this, but many new air mail routes have been added to the original transcontinental routes, and it is apparent that this service will continue to grow.

For the current fiscal year the appropriation for air mail contract service is $4,000,000, to which is to be added the sum of $500,000 from the fund available for the operation of the Government Air Mail Service. This makes a total for 1928 for this service of $4,500,000. The Budget recommendation for the ensuing fiscal year for this purpose was $6,000,000. The increase over current appropriations was to enable expansion of the air mail contract service. The subcommittee, after going into the subject carefully, concluded that to this total there should be added for expansions of the service the sum of $400,000 plus $30,000 for needs of the Post Office Department for personnel to supervise the air mail work. Hence this bill carries a total of $6,430,000 for the air mail contract service.

As pointed out in the committee report on this bill, the growth of this service has been tremendous during the past two years; and to-day there is heavy pressure from every quarter for the extension of air mail routes. The service, of course, is of a spectacular character, but its extension must be made conservatively and with due regard to legitimate needs and requirements. No definite figures are obtainable as to the net cost to the Government of this service. Only suggestive figures could be secured. These are based on a seven-day test in October last. The difference between the amount paid air mail contractors and the revenue from air mail stamps for this test period, October 10 to 16, was $17,651.46; that is to say, the net cost to the Post Office Department for this period was $17,651.46. Assuming these figures as constituting a fair average, the total excess of expenditures over receipts on account of the air mail contract service will run under present conditions to $847,270.08 for the year—in round numbers, $850,000. These figures, however, do not take into consideration the amounts expended and being expended through the Department of Commerce for the lighting of airways. When these lightings are established the cost of maintaining them should not be relatively a very large item.

It developed in the hearings that out of the 15 air mail contractors, perhaps not more than a half dozen are now making money on their contracts. The mail now being carried by air is the straight air mail postage, first-class mail prepaid at the rate of 10 cents per half ounce. Under the act of June 3, 1926, the total contract price which may be paid by the Postmaster General for this kind of mail is $3 per pound for the first thousand miles and 30 cents per pound additional for each hundred miles in excess of 1,000 miles. The earlier contracts were usually on the $3 per pound basis, as contractors did not then have the experience necessary to guide them and they bid the maximum allowed. Later experience and competition have played their part in the equation, and some of the newer contracts are based on much lower rates than were those of the earlier contracts, though the service required may be as exacting as that for which the maximum rate is allowed. To give a few examples: The rate now being paid on the route between Chicago and St. Paul is $2.75 per pound, whereas the rate from Salt Lake to Los Angeles is $3 per pound; and the rate from Chicago to Dallas is $3 per pound; again, the rate from Cheyenne to Pueblo is 83 cents a pound; from Albany to Cleveland, $1.11; from New York to Chicago, $1.24; and from Cleveland to Louisville—soon to be placed in operation—will be $1.22 per pound.

It may be interesting to know that the present total mileage of air mail routes is 8,044 miles and the number of routes 18, with a total of 17,444 miles flown thereover daily. In addition, seven new routes have been contracted for, with a total mileage of 3,656 miles, over which there will be a total daily flight of 7,312 miles. The new routes will be in operation on or before July 1 next, and on that date there should be in operation a total of 25 air mail routes, with a total length of 11,700 miles and a total daily flight of 24,756 miles.

Some of these routes are lighted, others are being lighted. Routes which have been day lines have been lighted and are being converted into night lines. The lighting of these airways is performed by the Department of Commerce. It is expected that by the 1st of next July there will be a total of 7,500 miles of these airways lighted. Of the additional 4,200 miles to be placed under air mail contract by the 1st of July a substantial portion will have to be lighted. In this connection I might suggest that these night-flying courses for our Postal Service, with much more accuracy, as well as with much more poetic suggestion, can be termed "star routes" than may be those post roads and post trails in the undeveloped sections of the country which have always borne this designation.

At this point I should like to include a list of the present air-mail routes and those under contract, and also tables showing the total weights of mail carried on the various air mail routes since the establishment of the air mail contract service on October 31, 1927; also some other brief tables, which will be informative:

AIR MAIL ROUTES

C. A. M. 1. Boston, Mass., via Hartford, Conn., to New York, N. Y., and return, 192 miles each way. Contract awarded October 7, 1925, to Colonial Air Transport (Inc.), 270 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y., at $3 per pound; service commenced July 1, 1926.

[1] Not compiled at this writing.

The question may be asked "Does the air mail service justify its cost?" I should say "Yes." Aside from any benefits which may arise from the standpoint of a quickened Postal Service, and aside from the question of added convenience to the patrons of that service, there are other considerations, I believe, quite as important as these. The operation of the Air Mail Service in this country has greatly aided the general interests of aviation, both commercial and military. Except for the pioneer work of the fearless flyers of the Air Mail Service operating directly under the Post Office Department, the demonstration could not have been made which was made, that this whole work is feasible, and may be commercially profitable in the hands of private contractors.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What the gentleman has stated is amply justified by results thus far obtained, and every consideration ought to be given to the air-mail routes. Is the gentleman sure that these routes are paying sufficiently so that there will be no difficulty in the future in having the contracts continued?

Mr. THATCHER. As I stated a moment ago, the testimony before our subcommittee was to the effect that at least half a dozen of the 17 or 18 operators are making money on their contracts. Some of them are doing very nicely, others are breaking even, and others are, perhaps, losing money. In my judgment, all of this will adjust itself after further experience, whereby those engaged in this work will be able to bid and be able to base their bids upon known conditions and known experiences; and they will be able to protect themselves just as bidders for other classes of mail transported on the land are in position to do.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman fear that some of these routes already established will have to be given up?

Mr. THATCHER. Some of them may be given up.

Mr. MADDEN. Some of them have already been given up.

Mr. THATCHER. And the "star route" contractors sometimes fail; but the entire work is getting more and more stabilized, and as experience goes on they will be able, better and better, to meet the conditions required. I believe that ultimately they will be able to bid with as much security, with as much knowledge of what is to take place, as may the bidders who transport the everyday mail of the country.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, what they will really have to get before long is legislation which will recognize the ability which they possess, and will also recognize the necessity of recognizing such ability and genius; and instead of having to compete with anybody who has not a dollar or see the contract given to a man without a dollar or without experience, give the contract to a man who has the money, the experience, the ability, the determination to win and to place this service on a positive, successful plane of business, and thereby help to develop what we might call a system of preparedness that may be built around the Air Service of the country. This is what we will have to take into consideration in the development of this service.

Mr. TILSON. Then the gentleman is of the opinion that more power and authority should be given to the administrative officers in connection with this matter?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we have got to do that.

Mr. THATCHER. Thus it has come about that the Government has gone out of this operation and private enterprise has stepped into it and is meeting all the requirements involved.

The practical knowledge and experience which has been derived and will be derived from air-mail operation will also prove of the greatest advantage to our military service and to our commercial operations. In the light of the marvelous progress which has already been made in aviation, it is hardly possible to visualize what to-morrow will bring forth.

To-day we have had in the galleries of the House the two distinguished French aviators who have just arrived in Washington after a 23,000-mile flight beginning at Paris, and which spanned the Atlantic sea and led northward through Latin America to our own shores. They are carrying forward, in a glorious way, the aviation work of a great people who have shown every aptitude for aviation.

If the air mail service of our own country had done no more than develop—as it did develop—the "Lone Eagle of the Skies," the heroic Lindbergh, that service would have justified its cost a hundredfold. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, since this Congress has assembled there has been considerable uneasiness expressed in certain quarters with reference to the extensive loans by the Federal reserve banks, especially in New York, known as brokers' loans, made not by the Federal reserve banks but by member banks, and it has come to the point where all sorts of remedies are being proposed.

For instance, we have before us in the Banking and Currency Committee a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] in behalf, I suppose, of agriculture, in which he proposed to fix the law so that in a Federal reserve city—as now or hereafter defined, and the Federal Reserve Board finds that such member bank makes extensive loans for use in dealing in securities on the stock exchange or in unlisted securities not eligible for rediscount in a Federal reserve bank, the board may require such member bank to hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net balance, in excess of the balance required in paragraph (c), in such amount as the board deems necessary to insure the safety of the member bank; but the total balance required to be so held and maintained by such member bank shall not be in excess of an amount equal to 20 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 5 per cent of its time deposits.

That resolution merely expresses the feeling that has grown up and is a tentative opinion as to what can be done and what can not be done from time to time. You will notice that the resolution says that "when the member bank makes extensive loans." Who is to determine what is an "extensive loan"? The fact is it is entirely unworkable. In addition to that, it penalizes one bank because it has made extensive loans, but that would not amount to anything if the business is large.

I do not expect to discuss the unworkable conditions of the resolution.

What has begun and what has gone on and what can be done? Speculation in stocks has gone on until the people begin to be alarmed at the enormous investments of reserves carried in the Federal reserve banks being loaned to member banks and by those placed with brokers who are dealing in stocks and securities that were not rediscountable in Federal reserve banks.

It got to the point where there was so much discussion that the President of the United States saw fit to come out with a statement, which was all right, but which I think was a mistake, but he made it on his responsibility and judgment.

That did to a certain extent relieve the pressure for a little while. But the thing went on until criticism became very active in a good many quarters, and you will notice what the result has been, and you will notice that it is a legitimate result.

The first thing was the raising of the discount rate in Chicago from 3½ to 4 per cent. That was a temporary setback to the market, and the newspapers said there was a shrinkage of a billion dollars in one day. Maybe that is true. There was a temporary fall on securities to that extent. That was simply the beginning of the program which no doubt was properly begun by the Federal Reserve Board in suggesting the bringing about of the slowing down of what seems to be a speculative market. They let that stand for a few days, and the market steadied itself, and then the Dallas bank raised its discount rate to 4 per cent.

From that time on, about once a week one of the banks raised its rediscount rate until nearly all are up to 4 per cent, and the apparent speculative borrowing has been largely curtailed. That is the way in which the Federal reserve bank can act, and not by some ironclad proposition by which you have got to step into a city where a bank is loaning extensively in that kind of paper and say to it, "You must be penalized by keeping a larger reserve against your deposits." I do not know, but I imagine that this has gone on until all but one or two of the banks have put their rates up to 4 per cent. They did not do it all at once, and it was well advised that they did not. At one time when the sentiment was becoming a little scary, and when there was great criticism of this wide extension of loans in the stock markets, if at that time there had been at once a raise of the rate of discount in all of the Federal reserve banks there would have been an alarming cataclysm in the stock market which might have ruined many good issues for the time being.

The Federal Reserve Board, as I conceive it, is following the line it should follow when it sees a situation of that kind develop. It gives a cushion to the fall, and it goes at it gradually, and raises the discount rate gradually, and it is doing it to-day. The result is that without any great wrench in the market we have an example of what the reserve board and the reserve system can do, judiciously and quietly, starting away off from the center of speculation, to steady things and stop that which is tending to become too speculative.

A question was raised some time ago when the Federal Reserve Board insisted on the Chicago bank lowering its rates. Some very rash talk was indulged in here by some men whose knowledge I conceive they think to be ultimate about that to the effect that the Federal Reserve Board has no right to require a bank to either lower or raise its rate of discount. All of you remember that. It was lowered at a time when there was surplus of money and at a time when, especially in the West in the great Chicago section, the crops were moving, where cheap money was desirable; and that was brought about by that very action. Not much has been said about that in the House of Representatives, and I conceive that the Federal Reserve Board was entirely within its rights. It hardly ever exercises that right, because a mere suggestion from them to any board of directors of any one of the banks is enough to bring about a change in the rediscount rates. In that instance their right to do this was questioned. I take advantage of this opportunity to read to you a few lines of the Federal reserve act, which confers the power upon them, which was vigorously challenged by some people in and around Washington.

The discount and rediscount by purchase and sale by any Federal reserve bank of any bills receivable and of domestic and foreign bills of exchange and acceptances, authorized by this act, shall be subject to such restrictions, limitations, and regulations as may be imposed by the Federal Reserve Board.

If that does not give them the right to regulate the rate which they shall charge, I can not conceive of anything that is more calculated to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Also, in view of the fact that the Federal reserve banks are banks of issue, does not the gentleman think it is wise that that authority be conferred upon some centralized agency such as the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do. I think it was wisely conferred, and I think it is explicitly conferred, and I think that generally it has been wisely exercised. I think it was wisely exercised in the Chicago case last year, when they needed cheap money in that country where they were moving the crops.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. And there is another paragraph that relates to the right of review, with reference to the powers of the board.

Mr. STEVENSON. The paragraph to which the gentleman refers says the Federal reserve banks have the right "to establish from time to time, subject to review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount to be charged," and so forth. If only the right to "review" was given, the power of the board might be questioned, but words were used to mean something, and "determination" was added evidently to allow the board power to change the rate after it reviewed it; and they exercised that right in the Chicago case, reviewed the rate in existence, decided it was too high for the then existing conditions, and "determined" the desirable rate and directed it to be inaugurated. The sweeping power to regulate all conditions of discount cited above is inconsistent with any other construction.

When they get ready to say on what conditions the Federal reserve bank can buy paper of member banks, one of the very important conditions is the question of what rate of discount they shall charge. With regard to all of this, the Banking and Currency Committee to-day is being flooded with resolutions and bills looking to fixing the rate of interest that shall be charged, and all that kind of thing, and fixing a great many of the other things that are left in the power of the board.

Let us for a moment look at what the board can do and what it does and how it does manage to regulate speculative conditions. In the first place, it can raise and lower the rate of discount, and it has raised it in nearly all of the banks, and thereby they judiciously curb what appears to be a coming speculative era.

In addition to that they have two powers. First, they can go on the open market and buy or sell paper. They have always from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 of paper which they can sell and put on the market, and when the markets become speculative, in the places where that apparent speculation needs to be curbed, the question of withdrawing circulation of money in that vicinity arises, and what do they do? They take their acceptances and short-time United States paper and say, "Go out and sell $500,000,000 of this paper." (I use these figures as an illustration; they may be much larger than the fact.) They put it on the market and attract people who have money in bank, and they buy this paper quickly and readily; and so the money is drawn out of the banks and paid into the Federal reserve banks and they lock it up, and that money is taken out of circulation to that extent. If they have made money a little scarcer, they have stopped the speculative era, because they have stopped the floating of loans on ineligible collateral.

And then, again, when money is tight and they realize that industry and business is being hampered with the tightness of money, then what do they do? They lower the discount rate and give directions to buy a large amount of these acceptances, the short-time paper, the paper that is always gilt edged and will be coming in, and they send out and buy from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 of it, and put it in their tills, and put the money in circulation.

And there you have a loosening up of money by these two processes under the Federal Reserve Board, through the Federal reserve banks having exercised the power, and in my judgment they have usually exercised it judiciously, either to ease business, on the one hand, or to curb a speculative era on the other. And for that reason I think it is well that we might stop and consider very carefully the many propositions that are being made to hamper and tie up this board and fix rates so that they can not use them for the purpose for which they were created, for the purpose of stabilizing business and supplying money to business when it needs it and withdrawing money when it does not need it. Sometimes mistakes have been made as to the proper treatment and bad results have followed, but usually the prudent, careful handling of these forces have been the safety of business. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

SONS OF UNION VETERANS OF THE CIVIL WAR

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 58

Resolved, That there shall be printed as a House document the proceedings of the annual report of the forty-sixth annual encampment by the commander in chief of Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War for the year 1927, with accompanying illustrations.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This resolution, as I understand it, is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. BEERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BLAND for an indefinite period, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri (at the request of Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri), for three days, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until Monday, February 13, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Saturday, February 11, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

(10.30 a. m.)

Department of Agriculture appropriation bill.

COMMITTEE ON THE MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

(10.30 a. m.)

To amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of radio communications," approved February 23, 1927 (H. R. 8825).

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

(10 a. m.)

Granting the consent of Congress to the Great Falls Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Potomac River (H. R. 7340).

Authorizing the Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls (H. R. 9830).

Granting the consent of Congress to the Delaware & New Jersey Bridge Corporation, a corporation of the State of Delaware, domiciled at Wilmington, Del., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River (H. R. 7725).

Granting the consent of Congress to Stranahan, Harris & Oatis, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Ohio, and Edward Ball, of the county of Duval, State of Florida, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River (H. R. 8287).

For Monday, February 13, 1928

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

(10 a. m.)

To amend Title II of an act approved February 28, 1925, regulating postal rates (H. R. 9296).

COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS

(10.30 a. m.)

To provide for the increase of the Naval Establishment (H. R. 7359).

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. McLEOD: Committee on Patents. H. J. Res. 36. A resolution to amend section 3 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the purpose of promoting efficiency, for the utilization of the resources and industries of the United States, etc.," approved February 8, 1918; without amendment (Rept. No. 621). Referred to the House Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DYER: Committee on the Judiciary. H. Res. 96. A resolution requesting the Attorney General to furnish information regarding violation of the antitrust laws by the fertilizer corporations and penalties, if any, imposed; adverse (Rept. No. 622). Laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4493) for the relief of Hugh S. Gibson, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOWMAN: A bill (H. R. 10798) to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10799) for the lease of land and the erection of a post office at Philippi, W. Va., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HASTINGS: A bill (H. R. 10800) to authorize an appropriation for the relief of the State of Oklahoma on account of roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the recent flood, to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. LEATHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 10801) for the exchange of certain lands situated in the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, for watershed lands in Red Butte Canyon, between T. SENATE

MONDAY, February 13, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who didst guide our fathers in the founding of this Republic, and hast granted us an heritage of glorious suffering and the strength of chastening trial, make us ever mindful of the loving spirit of him whose name to-day is honored by a grateful nation. We believe that Thou hast appointed us for the protection of the weak and hast given us a potent ministry to all the world. Help us, therefore, to close the wide chasm between the strong and weak, the rich and poor, to cast into it all pride and prejudice, luxury and lust, the insolence of riches with the rancor of poverty, that we may fill it full and make a highway for the King to pass over, and that we may build here the holy city foretold by all Thy prophets since the world began.

Grant this for the sake of Him who became poor that we might be made rich, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2656) to establish a minimum area for the Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LINCOLN AND THE UNION

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on the base of the Lincoln statue in Chicago are carved these words:

> My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union.

This was Lincoln's rejoinder to Greeley's criticism of the President's war policy.

In these few words are found the key to Lincoln's plans and purposes in the struggle between the States—the rebellion.

They are particularly significant in these times, for they emphasize the meaning of the Civil War and the importance of nationalism.

Throughout Lincoln's speeches and addresses runs the thread of the Union and the Nation. The Declaration of Independence was the seed of nationalism; the Federal Constitution was the National Union.

Lincoln said in Philadelphia:

> I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence.

In his first inaugural address he said:

> I hold that in contemplation of universal law, and of the Constitution, the Union of the States is perpetual.

For many years the language of the Constitution and its interpretation was a matter of popular and judicial dispute. The Supreme Court was established to determine, as far as such a tribunal can determine, what was the truth. The rights of the States and the powers of the Federal Government formed a fruitful topic of debate in and out of Congress. It developed into a struggle made sectional for political and economic reasons.

The giants of the Senate in those days clashed in words of fiery eloquence. Out of the instrument creating the Federal Government arose a cloud, now small, now ominously large. What was the Union of States? What was the Nation?

Webster came in words that thrilled the hearts of some and chilled the souls of others. He declared that this is a union—inseparable and imperishable.

Webster's Reply to Hayne appeared to settle the question of nationalism. Yet the irrepressible conflict approached and many States denied Webster's interpretation of the Constitution.

For 20 years the struggle persisted in stirring debate and angry discussion. Despite the logic and philosophy and the sophistry and claims employed by the disputants, the final battle ground was reached.

Then came Lincoln, the man called by Providence to meet the great issue and save the Union. Lincoln brought to that great issue a comprehension of his task. He possessed the kind of leadership necessary to bring popular opinion to a realization of the common danger.

Lincoln's First Inaugural Address was an appeal, not to enemies, but to friends. The closing words of that immortal epic were far above the passions and prejudices of the hour, and a message of tenderness and peace. It was unheeded and the armed conflict to save the Union began.

Said the President:

> The Union is much older than the Constitution * * *. One of the declared objects for ordaining and establishing the Constitution was to form a more perfect union.

The President declared:

> The Union is unbroken * * * and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union shall be faithfully executed in all the States.

Lincoln's special message to Congress in July, 1861, breathed the spirit of the Union under the Constitution. He declared:

> This issue presents to the whole family of men the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy * * * can or can not maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes * * *. Is a Government too weak to maintain its own existence?

Discussing the question of "sovereignty," the President said:

> The States have their status in the Union, and they have no other legal status * * *. The Union, and not themselves separately, procured their independence * * *. The Union gave each of them whatever of independence and liberty it has. The Union is older than any of the States, and in fact it created them as States.

It was claimed by some that the right to secede is consistent with the Constitution. Lincoln said:

> The principle itself is one of disintegration, and upon which no Government can possibly stand * * *. If a State may lawfully go out of the Union, having done so, it may also discard the republican form of government; so that, if to prevent this is an indispensable means to the end of maintaining the [constitutional] guaranty, then it is lawful and obligatory.

In his annual address to Congress December, 1861, Lincoln said:

> The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed.

Lincoln's immortal address at Gettysburg is the highest tribute mortal man can pay to a new nation—> conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

It was an appeal to God that "this Nation * * * should not perish."

The closing words of his second inaugural was another prayer that we might "bind up the Nation's wounds" and achieve and cherish lasting peace.

Lincoln's great adventure to save the Nation ended successfully but tragically. When Stanton, the great Secretary of War, watched the President's eyes close in eternal peace, he said: "He now belongs to the ages." So he does.

Lincoln still lives. He will never die. Every 12th of February exalts human sacrifice and immortalizes the Nation, for Lincoln's work was distinctively a national work. We would be recreant to him and his cause if we were to depart from the spirit of national preservation for which he gave his all.

The great task of Lincoln has a peculiar significance now, surrounded as we are by powerful efforts to depart from nationalism and plunge into the experiment of internationalism. We are in the midst of forces as perilous to the Nation as rebellion. This Union may be disintegrated by foreign political entanglements as well as by internal disputes. The Nation can be destroyed by external as well as domestic foes. What Lincoln gained in his great adventure may be lost by a single false step.

Senators, I need not remind you that a new political philosophy is imminent, demanding the eliminating of the national spirit and the substitution of what is called internationalism, in the name of world brotherhood. In many recent international gatherings, appeals have been made, particularly to the United States, to disavow nationalism as an enemy of human unlift and world peace. Peoples less fortunate and successful than ourselves are insidiously attempting to induce us to surrender nationalism—the great object of Lincoln's life and labor.

On the contrary, nationalism is the mainspring of our progress; it gives us our sweetest melodies and inspires us to our noblest achievements. Not that we love others the less, but that we love the United States the more.

Beware of the snare of political internationalism. It means a surrender of national rights, of a portion of our sovereignty, of our patriotism, of our national independence. It is impossible for an American to be a citizen of the United States and at the same time a citizen of any League of Nations. It is impossible to follow and defend the American flag and an international flag at the same time.

Right here in Washington, in the very shadow of the Capitol, the White House, and the Lincoln Memorial, are organizations claiming to be American, teaching by conversation and by rote, a doctrine of internationalism, political and economic. Such teachings tend to destroy the very Union and nationalism taught and won by Lincoln. If the Nation Lincoln fought to save is to be perpetuated; if the Union he struggled to save is to endure in all its power and glory, the forces of Americanism and patriotism must rise in their might against the enemy, within and without.

Within the confines of the Capital of the Nation, having branches in the several States and abroad, are organizations teaching the doctrine that patriotism is a false doctrine and hostile to peace. There are organizations of women, I am loath to say, doubting the wisdom of patriotism and demanding a definition of that word. They scoff at loyalty, devotion to country, as nothing but contributions to war.

In the name of "peace" there are numerous organizations, with foreign alliances and American memberships, complaining of the statement that communism, bolshevism, socialism, liberalism, and ultrapacifism all tend to the same end. Yet they do. All these organizations are either willing or unwilling agents of disintegrating forces, as perilous as the rebellion Lincoln faced.

Radical forces, well financed and industrious as well as persistent, are secretly undermining Lincoln's great work. Propaganda to poison the morals of the young and to deceive the unwary as to the real principles of the American Government and the nature and benefits of this Republic, are daily broadcast.

Senators, American histories are being written omitting the names of those who appeal to the American sentiment of loyalty and patriotism, and extolling socialist and communistic theories. The revolutionary movement circulates in the United States more than 600 publications.

The lessons of this anniversary of Lincoln's birth are plain. He guided this Republic in its darkest days and through its most critical period; who, with the aid of thousands of loyal and patriotic defenders, saved the Nation, sits silent and mute in yonder memorial. His spirit reaches out imploringly into the hearts and souls of men and women of to-day who love their country and yearn to save it from all peril.

The Nation lives because Lincoln lives. The Nation will live as long as the soul of Lincoln lives in us and those who follow us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln is one of the outstanding figures of American history. He lived and served during a period of great distress and disturbance. He is representative in history of a true type of American citizenship. As a representative of the Southland in this great body I ask to be permitted to pay an humble tribute of respect and honor to one whose memory and whose deeds and teachings are just as much revered in the land below the line of Mason and Dixon as in the North.

What other statesman of the middle period of the Republic so faithfully adhered to the fundamental principles upon which all our permanent institutions rest? Who else in all that time of strife and turmoil maintained so unfalteringly, so faithfully the true doctrines that have made this Republic glorious among the sons of men throughout the world?

Born in poverty, restrained and hampered by all the adversities that humble youth can know, his farsighted vision looked into the distant future, and amidst the clamor and strife of civil conflict he, the head of the Nation, maintained an attitude and spirit of charity. He loved the Union. He realized that the issues about which the citizenship of the Nation was greatly disturbed were fundamental and not one-sided. When the tide of conflict for four long years had flowed back and forth and victory at last came to the armies of the Union the South could find no better friend than Abraham Lincoln.

The best proof of his greatness and of his title to immortality is found in the fact that neither factionalism nor sectionalism could arouse him to hatred or bitterness. If he had lived to lead the Republic in the darkness that enveloped it during the period of reconstruction, the reunion of the North and South would have been hastened and the bitterness and hostility of spirit which lasted too long would have ended when the immortal Lee surrendered to the generous Grant at Appomattox.

As a representative in this body of what has come to be known as the new South, I bow my head to-day in reverence. I pluck a white rose, blooming in the gardens of Dixie, and lay it on the tomb of the brave, humble, awkward, patient, immortal Lincoln, whose courage and charity have been excelled by the leader of armed forces nowhere at no time in the annals of human history.

In what other land, under what other sky, could one of such humble birth, of such simple attributes, but of such determined principles, have attained the prominence which crowned Abraham Lincoln?

If he could come back to life and move again among the men who served this Nation, he would find nowhere a more secure abiding place, nowhere would he be more cordially received, than in the land of Dixie.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to be allowed the privilege of adding to this occasion a story about Mr. Lincoln which, so far as I know, has never been published. The gentleman by whom the story was told to me was the late John S. Gittings, of Baltimore, one of the most prominent business men and citizens of that city.

On the eve of the Civil War, just before Mr. Lincoln came on to Washington to be inaugurated, there was some fear, because of the extent to which the people of Baltimore were in sympathy with the South, that there might be at least a show of violence to Mr. Lincoln when he was passing through that city. Moved by the cordial impulses of a true woman, Mrs. John S. Gittings, the wife of Mr. John S. Gittings, the grandfather of the John S. Gittings to whom I have just referred, who was a daughter of Thomas Ritchie, the famous editor of the Richmond (Va.) Inquirer, invited Mrs. Lincoln, with her children, to be the guests of her husband and herself while Mr. Lincoln was passing through Baltimore on his way to the inauguration.

I might say, incidentally, that the brother of Mrs. John S. Gittings, one of the sons of Thomas Ritchie, killed in a duel Pleasants, the editor of the Richmond Whig, whose daughter also was one of the conspicuous figures in the social life of Baltimore at the time Mrs. John S. Gittings was.

After spending some little time under the roof of Mrs. Gittings, Mrs. Lincoln and her children passed on to Washington and rejoined Mr. Lincoln.

Later on, two young men in the State of Maryland were arrested and court-martialed and condemned to death for smuggling Confederate soldiers across the Potomac from the State of Maryland to the State of Virginia. In other words, they were condemned for precisely the same offense for which Edith Cavell was by a German court-martial during the World War. Of course, many instances of that sort were forgotten during the passions of the World War. Mrs. Gittings and some other ladies of Baltimore went over to see the President and to ask him at least to commute the sentence of these two young men. When the President was giving an audience to these women he recognized Mrs. Gittings, and he inquired, "Mrs. Gittings, you are a Southern woman, are you not?" She replied, "Yes, Mr. President; I have two brothers at this time in the Confederate Army." The President then asked, "And you are the Mrs. Gittings who took my wife and children under the protection of your roof when we were passing through Baltimore, are you not?" "Yes, Mr. President," she replied, "I had that pleasure." Then said Mr. Lincoln, "Mrs. Gittings, I give you the lives of those two men," and they were pardoned.

I mention that as just another illustration of the noble, the generous, the magnanimous traits of the man whom we are stopping for a moment by the wayside, so to speak, in our proceedings to honor to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hail from the State where the first capital of the Confederacy was located, at Montgomery, Ala.

I have read the debates in Congress and out of Congress about the War between the States.

I have read Rawls's View of the Constitution, which was the accepted textbook at the West Point Military Academy when Lee was a cadet there. That book had taught that the secession of a State depended solely upon the will of the people of the State.

I have read what Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts, said, that prior to the War between the States the opinion was almost universal that in case of conflict between the State and Federal Government's sovereignty resided with the State and to it allegiance was due.

I have read what Doctor Eliot, a northern man, said in his history of our country—that the question of secession was never authoritatively settled until the war settled it; and that is true.

Mr. President, that question had to be settled. It could not be settled in the halls of peace; and as brave men as ever battled went out from the South fighting for their rights as they understood them to exist under the Federal Constitution. The brave Northern soldiers went out fighting in the belief that the Union was about to be destroyed; and both sides were fighting for the right as God gave them the power to see it.

Secession was held generally amongst the States in the early days as an inherent right; but the war settled that question, and it settled the slave question, and the new status of the Union was finally and forever fixed.

The most unfortunate thing that ever happened, not only to the whole country but to the South in particular, was when the great Lincoln was assassinated. It was a heavy blow to the South. I wish in my heart that he could have lived to lead in the work of bringing the sections back together in the bonds of friendship and union. His big, brave heart would have prompted him to do the thing necessary to cause both sections to forget as soon as possible the bitterness and prejudice born of war. When the news of Lee's surrender came to President Lincoln at the White House the tears rolled down his face, and he said, "Have the band play Dixie." He turned to those around him and said, "Now, let us set ourselves to the work of healing the wounds of war and in the spirit of fairness and justice restore those States to their places in the Union."

Mr. President, Lincoln was a broad-minded man; a man of great heart and great soul. He loved and served his fellowman. I believe that if Lincoln could have lived he would have done more in 12 months to cause the North and South to get away from the bitter feelings created by the war and to bind the sections together in the ties of mutual friendship and interests than was done in 30 years after his death.

What a pity that he did not live to do that great work. Thomas Moore in his beautiful poem said:

> Hope's precious pearl in sorrow's cup
> Unmelted at the bottom lay,
> To shine again when all drunk up,
> And the bitterness should pass away.

If Lincoln could have lived, sectional hate and bitterness would have quickly melted away under his tender and loving ministrations, and he would have gone down to his grave finally the best-beloved man in the whole United States. He was born in the South and he understood the southern people.

I honor the great Lincoln, and, Mr. President, it gives me pleasure to say a word on the recurrence of his birth time. As Senator Ollie James, of Kentucky, once said:

> If Lincoln were living to-day there is not a foot of soil under Dixie's skies where he could not pillow his head upon a Confederate soldier's knee and sleep, and sleep in safety there.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, it is with great gratification that I listen to these eulogies of Lincoln from the Senators of the Southland. The first principle of Americanism was written by a statesman from the Southland. Thomas Jefferson said in the Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal, and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Add to that his statement of the great economic principle of equal rights to all and special privileges to none and you find included in those statements the great American principles that were advocated by Abraham Lincoln.

All of the troubles in our country have come from the fact that we have attempted to violate those principles of equality. The Southland did that in espousing the cause of slavery. Hence Lincoln, following the true principles of Jefferson, took the opposite view.

I therefore want to return to the Southland the greeting, and to venture to say that the South and the North can unite for a settlement of the great problems of this time upon the principles of Jeffersonian democracy and Lincoln republicanism, government of the people, by the people, for the people.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION—FLOOD RELIEF, MISSISSIPPI RIVER (S. DOC. NO. 56)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, for the War Department for flood relief, Mississippi River, in the amount of $1,500,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the State executive meeting of the Kansas County Superintendents at Topeka, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation to create a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COPELAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Albany and Troy, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WILLIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Capper bill (S. 2506) to amend the packers and stockyards act, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Cincinnati and Columbus, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BINGHAM presented the petition of the Governor of Hawaii and sundry officials and citizens of the Territory of Hawaii, praying for the passage of legislation granting pensions of $95 per month to George G. Whittier, aged 91; James K. P. Morelock, aged 84; Robert M. Overend, aged 79; and James Devlin, aged 79, all Civil War veterans residing in the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Trades Council of New Haven, Conn., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the reconditioning of the U. S. S. Mount Vernon and Monticello, so that the men employed in the navy yards may be kept working, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Ben Miller Council, No. 11, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Danbury, Conn., opposing the repeal of the national origins quota provision and favoring the execution of the quota provision in the existing immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Connecticut Association of Postmasters at Torrington, Conn., praying for the passage of legislation to increase the salaries of first, second, and third class postmasters, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of the Lowell House Mothers Club and sundry citizens, of Middletown, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed naval building program, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the Connecticut Federation of Women's Clubs, of Bridgeport, and the Woman's Club, of New Haven, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of the so-called McNary-Woodruff bill authorizing an appropriation for the purchase of land in Mad River Notch, situated in the town of Waterville, N. H., which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions of the Connecticut Federation of Women's Clubs, of Bridgeport, and the Woman's Club, of New New Haven, both in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the so-called McSweeney bill providing for research by various agencies of the United States Government as to methods of forest production and conservation, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HOWELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8527) for the relief of the International Petroleum Co. (Ltd.), of Toronto, Canada, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 283) thereon.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2644) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the P. L. Andrews Corporation (Rept. No. 284); and

A bill (H. R. 5925) for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland (Rept. No. 285).

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2227) for the relief of F. L. Campbell, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 286) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2424) for the relief of A. N. Ross, submitted an adverse report (No. 287) thereon.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 656) to amend section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 290) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 482) to provide relief for the victims of the airplane accident at Langin Field, Moundsville, W. Va., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 291) thereon.

Mr. BLEASE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1597) for the relief of Gaston M. Janson, reported adversely thereon and moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed, which was agreed to.

Mr. DALE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 761) granting the consent of Congress to Dwight P. Robinson & Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River (Rept. No. 301);

A bill (S. 1170) granting the consent of Congress to the Maysville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River (Rept. No. 292);

A bill (S. 1410) granting the consent of Congress to Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River (Rept. No. 295); and

A bill (H. R. 9186) authorizing the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va. (Rept. No. 293).

Mr. DALE also, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1104) granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River at or near Garland City, Ark. (Rept. No. 300);

A bill (S. 1406) granting the consent of Congress to Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Pahucah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or within 1 mile of Canton, Ky. (Rept. No. 296); and

A bill (S. 1409) granting the consent of Congress to Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River (Rept. No. 299).

Mr. DALE also, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1407) granting the consent of Congress to Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River within 1 mile of Iuka, Ky. (Rept. No. 297); and

A bill (S. 1408) granting the consent of Congress to Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or within 2 miles of Smithland, Ky. (Rept. No. 298).

Mr. DALE also, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted a report (No. 294) to accompany the bill (H. R. 7916) authorizing the Madison Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Madison, Jefferson County, Ind., heretofore reported from that committee and passed.

Mr. BRATTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1941) to provide for the acquisition of rights of way through the lands of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 302) thereon.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT BATON ROUGE

Mr. DALE. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6487) authorizing the Baton Rouge-Mississippi River Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La., and I submit a report (No. 289) thereon. I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN OKLAHOMA

Mr. CARAWAY. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7011) to detach Okfuskee County from the northern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma and attach the same to the eastern judicial district of the said State, and I submit a report (No. 282) thereon. The need for the immediate passage of the bill is urgent, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PINE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

JOSEPH JAMESON

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Claims I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 3926) for the relief of Joseph Jameson, and I submit a report (No. 288) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have it go to the calendar.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say a word, I think he will not make that request.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold my request until I hear the Senator's statement. If there is any good reason for the immediate passage of the bill, I should like to know it.

Mr. WILLIS. Here is the reason for it. This is a bill which passed both House and Senate in the last session of Congress, but in the rush incident to final adjournment it did not reach the President in time for his signature. It has been fully gone into and there is not the slightest objection to it in any quarter, so far as I know.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have the bill read before I consent to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. KING. I think it ought to go to the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Ohio ought to explain the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If the junior Senator from Utah will withhold his objection, I shall do so.

Mr. KING. Very well.

Mr. WILLIS. As I said a moment ago, the bill has been very carefully gone into by the committees in both House and Senate. The bill passed both the House and Senate in the last Congress, but in the rush incident to final adjournment it did not reach the President in time for his signature.

The facts of the case are these: I have all the papers here and the recommendation from the department. There is not the slightest suggestion of any blame on the part of the postmaster. The fact is that highwaymen entered this post office, overpowered the employees, blew the safe, and carried away the money, some $10,000. The Post Office Department immediately and very strongly recommended that credit should be given the postmaster, that he was in no respect to blame for what had occurred.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was there any charge that he was negligent——

Mr. WILLIS. Not the slightest.

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence—in retaining in the office so large a sum of money?

Mr. WILLIS. No; there was not the slightest charge of that nature.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows in a great many instances, in violation of the rule, postmasters retain, instead of promptly remitting, large sums of money, thus inviting robbery because the existence of the retention of the money becomes known in some way.

Mr. WILLIS. That charge was not made at all in this case. The Senator will recall that the post office at Lorain, Ohio, a city of probably, I should say, at least 30,000 people, was robbed as I have explained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the report of the department is unqualifiedly favorable?

Mr. WILLIS. Absolutely. The Senator has correctly stated the facts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of Joseph Jameson, postmaster at Lorain, Ohio, in the sum of $10,662.10, due the United States on account of public funds and property lost in the burglary of the post office on March 1, 1925.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUEBLO INDIAN LANDS, NEW MEXICO

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if in order, I desire to call up the motion which I entered a few days ago to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 700) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes, was concurred in.

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. FRAZIER. There will be no debate, I will say to the Senator from Montana. There is no objection to my request, as I understand.

Mr. EDGE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Has morning business been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been concluded. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota, heretofore entered, to reconsider the vote. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRAZIER. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill, as amended, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be so referred.

BILLS INTRODUCED

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 3180) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Dr. A. W. Pearson, of Peever, S. Dak., and the Peabody Hospital at Webster, S. Dak., for medical services and supplies furnished to Indians; to the Committee on Claims.

PROPOSED STATUES OF GRANT AND LEE

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I desire to introduce the bill which I send to the desk, and for it I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill at length.

The bill (S. 3163) to provide for statues of Gens. Robert E. Lee and U. S. Grant was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $50,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War for statues of Gens. Robert E. Lee and U. S. Grant; and that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to secure such statues as soon as practicable, each to be of similar material and workmanship and of the same size, and to have the same placed, respectively, on pedestals situate at the right and left of the main entrance to the Army War College in the city of Washington, D. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this a report from a committee; and if so, from what committee is the bill reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina introduces the bill and asks for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Without reference to a committee?

Mr. BLEASE. I will state what it is. I do not think it is necessary to refer it to a committee. It simply authorizes the Secretary of War to spend an amount not exceeding $50,000—of course, he does not have to spend that much, but I have put in that limit—for the purpose of having made and erected a statue of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant and one of Gen. Robert E. Lee, to be placed on pedestals to the right and left of the main entrance to the War College.

We have heard some nice talk this morning about the good feeling between the North and the South, and I think this would go at least some little distance to show that it is not a matter of mere words but that we mean a little of what has been said.

Mr. SMOOT. If the bill were simply to provide for a statue of Grant alone I would have the same objection. It ought to go to a committee. All bills of this character have been referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BLEASE. The only objection I have to it going to the committee is that I know it will never get back.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BLEASE. I have introduced about 15 bills and, with the exception of one, I have known of none coming back.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator appear before the committee in support of the bills he introduces?

Mr. BLEASE. No; but I have written letters to them and asked for reports and have not been able to get them. I do not mind the other point so much, but there has been so much said about good feeling between the North and South this morning that I want to see some action to prove it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the bill ought to go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is objection made?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. BLEASE. That is what I expected, Mr. President, to come from the North.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN W. WOOD

On motion of Mr. NEELY, it was—

Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 23) granting a pension to John W. Wood be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRINTING OF SURVEY OF DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. PHIPPS submitted a resolution (S. Res. 144), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript of the report of a survey of the public schools of the District of Columbia, transmitted by the United States Bureau of Efficiency to Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, be printed with illustrations as a Senate document.

WORLD WAR VETERANS IN ST. ELIZABETHS ASYLUM

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on February 8 had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Frank T. Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, addressed to me, in regard to complaints about treatment of veterans at St. Elizabeths Hospital and allegations that men who were entirely sane have been confined there without court proceedings at the request of the Veterans' Bureau.

Director Hines in his letter referred to articles which have appeared in a Washington daily paper as the origin of this matter.

A brief letter from the managing editor of that paper I ask to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in view of a possible injustice that may be done the paper and person referred to, though undoubtedly not intended, by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOODING in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 10, 1928.

Mr. FRANK T. HINES,
Director of United States Veterans' Bureau,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8, 1928, page 2665 is reproduced a letter from you to Senator DAVID WALSH, containing the following paragraph:

"The situation referred to by Mr. Wallace apparently came to his attention through an article appearing in the February issue of a magazine known as Plain Talk. The person submitting this article formerly submitted similar articles to one of the Washington daily papers, but this paper discontinued using such material several months ago."

The inference is that Mr. P. H. Skinner, writer of these articles, had submitted them to the Washington Times for publication, and that the Times had discontinued use of such material because it had been found undesirable. The facts are:

Mr. Skinner was a regular member of the Washington Times staff and was assigned to these articles by the editor. They were discontinued only when it was the belief of the editor that they had accomplished the purpose for which they were designed, namely, to inform the public as to the facts surrounding lunacy proceedings in Washington.

Mr. Skinner continued as a member of the staff of the Times for a considerable period after the completion of these articles.

Yours very truly,

AVERY C. MARKS, Jr.,
Managing Editor.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION AT HOUSTON, TEX.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, in order that the Democrats of the country and the people generally may know that Houston, Tex., is making adequate preparations to take care of all who visit that city on June 26, at the convention which will name the next President of the United States, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement issued on February 11 by the Democratic National Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the bureau of publicity of the Democratic National Committee]

GETTING READY FOR THE GREAT CONVENTION

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11.—Houston and Texas entire are preparing, heart, soul, and pocketbook, to entertain the Democratic National Convention, which is to assemble June 26. No city or State ever entered upon such an enterprise with greater enthusiasm, good will, and determination to do all that can be done as hosts.

The finance committee of Houston has decided to raise $350,000 instead of $300,000. The big drive for subscriptions is to open Monday, February 13, but already $100,000 has been volunteered. It appears that Houston and the State of Texas, which is loyally backing the convention city, will raise about $500,000. A brand new 20,000-capacity convention hall, for which bids have been received and for which a contract will be let February 20, will cost $100,000. The city government of Houston pays for it. Of the $350,000 to be subscribed, $200,000 is for the Democratic National Committee and $150,000 for entertainment during the convention.

Women's clubs of Texas have organized to do their share in raising funds and entertaining delegates. A Rio Grande Valley leader has sent in a $1,000 check and pledged further support of that part of the State.

Jesse H. Jones, whose bid for the convention in behalf of Houston won over the national committee at its meeting in Washington January 12, and who has been appointed active chairman of the committee on arrangements of the national committee by Clem Shaver, national chairman, says "Houston is big enough, proud enough, and rich enough to provide all that is needed for the convention, nevertheless Houston is not going to reject contributions from other parts of Texas."

R. S. Sterling, chairman of the Houston finance committee, commenting on the eagerness of all Texas to lend a hand financially, says "they feel it is an honor which should go to all and not be selfishly enjoyed by Houston alone. I believe they are entitled to participate, and I believe Texas is going to rise to the occasion and show a spirit of hospitality unexcelled by any other State."

Mayor J. P. Logan, of Port Arthur, sending a $10 check, suggested one-half million Texans drop a dollar a piece in the big hat, and remarked that would be $500,000 for the "greatest round-up in Texas history."

Galveston has formed a special committee, under the leadership of Mayor Jack E. Pearce, to cooperate with Houston. Galveston is not far from the convention city and a good many visitors may stay at Galveston hotels. Transportation facilities between the cities are excellent.

The Kerrville Chamber of Commerce sent in a letter, reading "Three cheers for Houston. Good friends, we are always with you. Draw on us for $250."

A survey of hotel and apartment-house rooms is now underway. Citizens are offering their homes very generally for accommodation of persons who may not be able to obtain rooms at the hotels, which will be held primarily for delegates and alternates, members of the Democratic National Committee, and the press.

J. W. Evans, of the Houston Chamber of Commerce, says the hotels will accommodate between 7,500 and 8,000 guests, the number of rooms now being between 2,750 and 3,000. He estimates that accommodations for not fewer than 5,000 guests may be obtained in the various apartment houses and that from 10,000 to 12,000 visitors will be provided for in Houston homes. If necessary, Mr. Evans says, school buildings and office buildings will be pressed into service, and adds, "You can say one thing, and that is that visitors will not sleep in Pullman cars."

The auditorium, Mayor Holcombe, of Houston, says, will be completed June 1. He has announced a plan of separate reception committees, to be composed of former citizens of each of the States.

Garden clubs are leading in the movement to beautify for the convention. A few days ago 60,000 shrubs and flowers were distributed to junior high-school students to be taken home to plant.

One thousand bundles of five rosebushes each, at $1 a bundle, were sold in 40 minutes by the associated garden clubs and the Houston Chronicle. More than 500 people were turned away. They came back next day, when 3,000 more bundles were available.

All highways leading to Houston are to receive special attention, says R. S. Sterling, who is chairman of the Texas State Highway Commission, as well as chairman of the Houston committee on finance. Mr. Sterling says:

"Right now the roads are in splendid shape, and by convention time they will be even better. I am going to see that roads in Texas are in shape for the heavy travel we anticipate this summer.

"Many of the delegates and others coming to the convention will come by motor. The old Spanish trail, leading from Jacksonville, Fla., to California, by way of New Orleans, Houston, and San Antonio, is in first-class condition. Visitors will find many attractions in Texas and certainly will want to motor to places like the San Jacinto battle ground, 20 miles from Houston, to the Gulf, to beautiful old San Antonio—even to Mexico. The roads to Mexico, by the way, are in fine condition."

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE SENATE RULES—REGULATION AND REGISTRATION OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OR AGENTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I send to the clerk's desk a notice which I ask to have read, under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All persons employed for hire as attorney or agents to represent individuals, partnerships, societies, corporations, or foreign governments, to advocate or oppose pending legislation, shall register the fact of such employment, a statement of the particular legislation, and the name of their employer with the Secretary of the Senate, before engaging in such employment.

Upon motion of any Member of the Senate, supported by a majority vote, any designated employee may be summoned to appear before the Committee on Rules and required to give the names of all persons for whom he is employed or if an employer, the names of those who were employed by him to influence legislation during the current session of Congress and an account of all expenditures incurred or promised for the purpose.

The chairmen of the committees shall require all persons appearing before them to advocate or oppose pending legislation to state whether they are employed for the purpose, and if so, by whom employed. A list of employers so disclosed shall be kept by the committee, and upon motion of any member any designated employer shall be summoned before the committee and required to give the names of all persons employed by him to influence legislation during the current session of Congress, and an account of all expenditures incurred or promised for the purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, as I understand the rules of the Senate, a notice is required to be given one day before any amendment to the rules is presented. I now give that notice. Pursuant to this notice, I shall to-morrow present a resolution for the purpose of adding an additional rule to the present rules.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether he thinks he can accomplish by a rule what he evidently is trying to accomplish. There is no penalty attached to the violation of the rule. If his object can be accomplished in that way, it would be a very simple thing. The purpose the Senator has in view has my entire sympathy, but I was wondering whether we could reach it in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I interpret the rule, it would be possible to summon any person violating it before the bar of the Senate, and to that extent the Senate would have control over violators of the rule of the Senate. I will say to the Senator that I have, as undoubtedly he has, become discouraged at the possibility of ever getting any antilobby law enacted by Congress. Bills for this purpose have been pending here since I have been a Member of the body. I have presented bills similar to the very satisfactory antilobby legislation in operation in Massachusetts. No action has resulted. Of late I have been trying to find some way to check this notorious abuse, which perhaps was never more flagrantly practiced than at the present time, and have concluded that much benefit will come from a Senate rule. Therefore it seems to me that such a rule as I have proposed would at least serve the purpose of letting us have a public record of some of the invisible government that surrounds the Congress. The public, who have no paid lobbyist here, have a right to know what paid interests are trying to inform and influence us.

Mr. President, the idea of controlling the activities in part of the so-called lobby by a Senate rule is entirely new and is presented because of the almost certain failure of getting legislation through the Congress to this end. It presents an opportunity to the Senate to lead the way toward some form of regulation of the lobby at the National Capitol.

Of course, there is a lobbying that is perfectly legitimate and perfectly proper. Members of Congress do not want to keep themselves away from getting all information that is essential; but certainly there can be no valid objection to something that will let us know who the people are that are doing the lobbying, whom they represent, and what they are receiving in the way of fees.

Mr. President, it is loudly asserted that Washington is just now swarming with lobbies of every kind. I am not particularly objecting to that if it is known just exactly what these lobbyists are and whom they represent. If some action is not taken, we are going to be very much handicapped and embarrassed in doing our work here purely in the public interest during the present session of Congress.

I think it is a very unfortunate state of affairs to have the legislative branch of the United States Government without rules and provisions restricting and limiting the presence of lobbyists, compelling the registration of lobbyists and making public the interests and special causes that they represent and the amount of fees or money collected and paid out by those interested in legislation, and I am surprised that some serious effort has not been made in the past to prevent the activities of lobbyists in and about Congress by at least a registration act.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator expressed the idea that he was going to have this referred to-morrow to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand, the rules of the Senate require that notice shall be given of a proposed rule, and it has been the practice that a proposed rule shall be referred first to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. It is very proper that that shall be done, but I do not see why the Senate could not do it now just as well as to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The course which has generally been followed, and the rules require it, has been to give notice one day before the resolution for the rule is presented.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, while this matter is being discussed, I want to call attention to the fact that at the beginning of the present session of the Senate I introduced a bill which would compel those seeking to influence legislation to disclose the names of their employers. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and by that committee referred to the subcommittee of which I am a member, and I have been directed to report it back favorably to the committee. It has been my intention to do so at the next meeting of the committee.

We all realize that there are a number of men interested in legislation who are really helpful. They represent, but not for profit, organized groups of citizens, like the group that represents organized labor, or the farmers, or many others that really are very helpful. They supply information.

There is another lot of lobbyists who represent people for hire, who seek to make profit out of either promoting or defeating legislation. That is the class of people, I take it, we all want to reach. We want to know whom they represent, how much money they have for carrying on propaganda, how they spend it, and who gets it. The proposed legislation which I hope the committee will report out at its next meeting will, if passed, give us that information.

The legislation provides that if one represents for hire somebody who hopes to make profit out of legislation, or the defeat of legislation, he must reveal the name of his employer, how much he is paid, how much he has for expenses, and how he expends it, under very severe penalties for not doing so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to put the same question to the Senator from Arkansas that I put to the Senator from Massachusetts. Has the Senator given any thought to the question as to whether the Senate could by rule reach this matter?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I have not thought about that. I had thought, and I think yet, that it would be very much better to have the force of a statute back of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that, but the Senator from Massachusetts has very well said that it is a difficult matter to get such a measure enacted into law; and it is, indeed, a difficult subject on which to legislate. As the Senator has said, there are some of these people who are very high-class people, and who are of very great assistance to committees. On the other hand, there are the others, who are about as low a class of people as you can think of.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think the exceptions provided in the bill about which I have been speaking would take care of just the situation the Senator speaks of. It would reach the people who are here for hire, who want an advantage, and who do not want people to know who are their employers, or how much money they spend.

There was a man down here who picked up $60,000 from some people interested in legislation. He said he spent $58,000. We want to reach that sort of a man and make him tell, first, who employed him, and, second, how much he received, how much money he was given for lobbying, and what disposition he made of it. If we had a statute which would make such men reveal their interests, that sort of lobbying would stop.

The strangest thing is this: The most gullible people in America are the big business interests. They will hire a lobbyist who is so cheap he could not fool a 10-year-old boy, and he will live off of them for years. They will load him up with money and he will come down here and write lying letters back to them, and they will take up new collections and finance him to do wonders, and no one ever saw him who did not realize how cheap and ineffective he is. I have a personal rule—whether it is a good one or a bad one—that when anybody comes into my office and commences to open a brief case and say, "I represent so-and-so," I say, "Then you go out in the hall and represent them, but you will not do it here in my office." Such men can go before the committees.

But, as I said a moment ago, some groups of people who are here representing organized labor, representing farmers, representing many other things that are high class, are helpful, and nobody needs to have a check upon them because they are not trying to use money to influence people. The other groups, I suppose, do not ever use a dollar. They acquire it by representing what they find to be a fertile field and get the money and put it in their pockets. I think we can legislate such groups out of existence very largely, and I hope we are going to do that very thing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the Senator state his view on the matter. I know the Senator early in the session introduced a bill bearing on this very subject matter, and that it has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I would like to ask what is the status of that bill?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I was trying to make plain. There was a subcommittee appointed, and the subcommittee agreed unanimously to report it favorably to the full committee. I am very hopeful, indeed, that the full committee will report it out and have it put on the calendar, and that that may be done at the next meeting of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would prefer legislation in the nature of the bill which the Senator has presented, but I appreciate the many difficulties which can not be discussed here which such a bill has and would encounter. I therefore thought that a rule would be some contribution by giving public information as to who is employed here to promote or oppose legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think so myself.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A rule would be very helpful in restraining some of the abuses by giving us information; and a rule can be adopted immediately, while an act of Congress is unfortunately most remote.

Mr. CARAWAY. We have merely to turn the light of publicity on this crowd and then their usefulness or rather their claimed usefulness as lobbyists will disappear.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad the Senator is pushing his bill and interested in the regulation of the so-called lobby.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I state to the Senator from Arkansas that my attention has not been called to the bill to which he has referred. We have a law in Maryland which provides that everyone who goes down to the legislature representing any interests which are concerned about pending legislation has to register his name and his address in a registration book kept for that purpose. If I went down there, for instance, as the legal representative or other representative of one of the railway companies I would have to register my name and address in this book and also the business which brought me to the State capitol. In the case of any interest which is represented by anyone that must be done. Then there is a penalty for not registering. Does the Senator's bill go further than that?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; it goes a bit further than that. It requires that they shall register with the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House and disclose who their employers are, and to say how much, if any, money they have been given, and then file a report at the end of each month of how they have disposed of the money. It makes it absolutely certain then that the people who are being deluded into paying out money to hire cheap lobbyists or lobbyists of any kind will cease such payments, because I know that whenever the lobbyists are compelled to disclose their employers, how much money they have, and what they do with it, that will end it.

DECISIONS OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, which I ask may be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the Constitution of the United States not only does not confer upon Congress the authority to impose tariff and other import duties upon commerce between the States, but affirmatively asserts the principle of free and untrammeled commerce between the States; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission in recent decisions and opinions has construed the transportation act and the interstate commerce act to confer upon it the authority not to regulate the conduct of interstate commerce, but to control it to the extent of excluding the commerce of certain States from competitive markets outside their borders and of giving a monopoly of trade in those markets to competitors in other States; and

Whereas this construction of the statutes by the Interstate Commerce Commission will work inevitable and fatal injury to the interchange of all business between the States, and therefore to the general welfare of all the people, and said decisions and opinions have already proven injurious to the coal, agricultural, horticultural, manufacturing, and fishing industries of Virginia by directly impairing its internal business in interstate commerce: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Virginia be, and are hereby, requested to do everything in their power to effect such changes in the Federal statutes as will prevent a repetition of such decisions and to have said statutes so amended as to make the construction thereof aforesaid impossible.

Agreed to by house of delegates February 3, 1928.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk, House of Delegates.

Agreed to by the senate February 3, 1928.

O. V. HAUGE,
Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that had I been in the Chamber last week, instead of being detained by illness, I should have voted for the resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] without the amendment that he was pleased to accept. At the proper time, whether in executive session or in open session of the Senate, it is my purpose to address myself to the subject matter of this concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia.

I do not now participate in the opinion that there is any necessity of amending the statute itself therein referred to. I think the trouble lies in the Interstate Commerce Commission rather than in the statute, and in an utter perversion of its power. I think its recent decisions involve a usurpation of power that constitutes a positive menace to industry and to the commerce of the country. As I have stated, at an appropriate time I shall undertake to demonstrate that fact to the Senate and shall do all that within me lies to correct the vice at its source, which is the Interstate Commerce Commission itself.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I fully concur in what my colleague [Mr. GLASS] has said regarding the resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia which he has presented. Unless one has read the recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Lake Cargo case it is impossible to realize to what extent the commission has arrogated to itself the position of being the industrial master of America. It has arrogated to itself the power to fix rates on all railroads, to control competition, to control markets, to say who shall and who shall not sell goods in certain markets, and that certain sections and States shall be controlled by its imperial industrial will. I am satisfied it was never intended that the Interstate Commerce Commission should become the industrial master of America, should determine what States shall develop and what industries shall thrive and what shall not thrive.

At the proper time I shall unite with my colleague in presenting this issue to the Senate and seek relief from such arbitrary power as is now arrogated to itself by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in this connection, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a joint resolution unanimously adopted by both houses of the Legislature of Kentucky with reference to the pending matter.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE SENATE,
Regular Session 1928.

Senate Joint Resolution 7 of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, session of 1928, memorializing the Congress of the United States to inquire into the activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission in its interference with the freedom of commerce between the States, and its acts seeking to control industry and to stifle and suppress competition, and requesting Congress to adopt such legislation as is necessary to prevent a continuation of such acts and policies by the Interstate Commerce Commission

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission is an arm or agency of the Congress of the United States, created by the Congress to perform certain duties in the regulation of transportation for the protection of the shippers, the carriers, and the consumers of the United States; and

Whereas while we recognize the respect due to the decisions of all tribunals lawfully constituted by the Federal Government for the orderly conduct of its lawful functions, the right to observe and criticise the activities of such tribunals remains with the people for whose benefit they are assumed to have been created; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission, in exercising the powers vested in it by the Congress, has adopted the policy of increasing the disparity between the rates of competing producers and shippers and of steadily increasing the freight rate disadvantage of the long-haul shipper by making distance the sole measure of rates; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission is further exercising its powers to prevent carriers from reducing rates where such reductions are necessary in order to enable shippers served by such carriers to compete in the markets, and where the carriers proposing such reductions are able to make same without casting a burden on other traffic; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission in the further exercise of its powers has repeatedly found that the shipper or community having the lower rate is unduly prejudiced by the higher rate charged competing shippers or communities alleged to be unduly preferred; and

Whereas the aforesaid acts and policies of the Interstate Commerce Commission result in restricting competition, zoning the commerce of the country, and favoring certain sections thereof as against other sections and restricting the commerce between the States; and

Whereas the majority opinion in Lake Cargo rates, 1925, is illustrative of these tendencies on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its method of fixing railroad freight rates, particularly on coal, all of which we deem unsound, unlawful, and dangerous, and may be set forth as follows:

1. To magnify the importance of a so-called rate structure, regardless of actual transportation conditions and abilities of railroads serving certain communities;

2. To give undue, an apparently controlling weight to mere differences in mileage, disregarding the facts as to actual transportation costs and operating conditions, and particularly disregarding, as concerning Kentucky, the fact that some railroads have been constructed solely for the purpose of moving coal, which fact takes such roads out of the class of roads carrying diversified freight;

3. To increase freight differentials in order to offset higher costs of production of coal;

4. To disregard the fundamental purpose of the Constitution to promote interstate commerce, and to destroy it under the name of regulation;

5. To carry these methods of rate making to the point where the result is the zoning of the country so that established markets would have to be abandoned, established business plants moved, sources of supply cut off, and the whole business structure of the country destroyed; and

Whereas these tendencies of the Interstate Commerce Commission are particularly injurious to the State of Kentucky in their destructive effect upon its coal industry for the reason that a large part of its coal must be transported long distances to reach its accustomed markets where it meets in competition coal produced under differentials in freight rates adverse to it fixed in the manner here stated; and

Whereas John J. Esch has been reappointed by the President as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which nomination is now before the Senate of the United States for confirmation; and

Whereas the said John J. Esch has shown, by his votes in important cases, including the case above cited, before the commission during his past term as a member thereof, that he indorses, supports, and advocates the objectionable, dangerous, and unlawful tendencies and acts of the commission hereinbefore set out, and is not, therefore, in our opinion a proper person to be a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission: And, therefore, be it

Resolved that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, duly assembled, Respectfully petition the Senate of the United States not to confirm the appointment of John J. Esch to be a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Further, that the Senators of this State be requested to vote against the confirmation of the said John J. Esch as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that they, as well as all the Representatives in Congress from this State, be requested to do all that they honorably can to prevent such confirmation; and

Further, that the governor of this State be requested to use his best efforts to the same end; and

Further, that a copy of this joint resolution be furnished the Senate of the United States, the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Senators and Representatives of the State of Kentucky.

(This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of Kentucky on January 23, 1928.)

JAMES BREATHITT, Jr.,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.
JOHN S. MILLIKEN,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

R. F. FIELDS,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHARLES J. HOWES,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am very much delighted to ascertain that a number of Senators have discovered the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission is usurping power that was not granted to it by the Congress. A very lamentable discussion went on here for a number of years with regard to the long-and-short-haul clause. In that discussion Senators contended that Congress had no authority to vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to allow a rate that did not bring a fair return, so that the railroads might carry freight where it would not go if the rate specified yielded a fair return. I remember the distinguished former Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] stated time and time again that Congress had amended the interstate commerce act three times for the purpose of informing the Interstate Commerce Commission that it had no authority to allow railroads a rate that would not bring a fair compensation so that they could do business where they could not do it if they did have such fair compensation. In other words, under the long-and-short-haul action of the Interstate Commerce Commission that body was favoring certain points as against other points, and to do that, sir, it had to admit that it was not fixing a compensatory rate; in fact, it had to admit that the rate was not compensatory because if it was compensatory the favored points could not have the freight.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nevada that in its recent decisions the Interstate Commerce Commission has gone far beyond the question of adjusting railroad rates with respect to their compensatory nature. It has assumed the authority to establish the industrial processes of an enterprise and to say if a particular enterprise is conducted under processes of thrift and profit railroad rates may be adjusted so as to favor another competitive enterprise, the processes of which are thriftless and unprofitable. The intricacies of the long-and-short-haul problem are not at all involved in the recent decisions. In them the Interstate Commerce Commission has appropriated power that does not reside in Congress itself and therefore can not be delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Virginia that many persons living in the intermountain region believe that an improper interpretation has been placed upon various provisions of the interstate commerce act, as a result of which great injury has resulted to the industrial and economic interests of that section. The belief is prevalent in the section referred to that a proper construction of the long-and-short-haul clause of the present transportation act has not been adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission. As a result, the economic development of a number of States has been arrested and many industries destroyed.

Mr. GLASS. But not until now has the commission ever undertaken to control the operating processes of an industry.

Mr. KING. The interpretation placed upon the provisions referred to has operated to the disadvantage of industries in various sections of the United States and in favor of industries in other parts of the country.

Mr. GLASS. But its decisions in those cases, if I understand them, related altogether to the adjustment of railroad rates with a view properly to compensating the railroads. In these later decisions the Interstate Commerce Commission has undertaken to control the methods of operation of the industry itself, and to relate its adjustment of railroad rates to the processes of operation.

Mr. KING. Of course, if that be true it can not be defended.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me a word further, the complaint in this case is not lack of compensation to the railroads. The railroads themselves asked to be permitted to reduce their rates so as to meet competition where favoritism had been extended to other railroads. They admit that the rates are profitable; they admit that the rates they have asked to have reduced to meet competition give them just and full compensation, but the commission has refused to permit them, saying practically that it and it alone will determine where industry shall or shall not be developed.

Mr. KING. The transportation question is one of great importance to the entire country. The prosperity of the United States is largely dependent upon our railroads. They have served a highly important purpose in our material development. They have linked sections of our country together and have done much to unify all parts of our broad land. That many of the railroads were chargeable with mistakes and delinquencies was sufficiently established and brought about the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the railroads had been free from maladministration and discriminations, there would not have been sufficient sentiment in favor of creating a Federal commission of the character and authority possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That this administration has accomplished much good all must admit; that it has made mistakes its best friends will not deny. It is finite and possesses the infirmities that judicial and administrative bodies possess.

I should like to see the Interstate Commerce Commission pursue a course so fair and just as to make it free from just criticism. It is important that it have the confidence of the people in every section of the country. So far as I am concerned, I should like to fortify it in the confidence of the people. I have been reluctant to legislate to control this important body in the exercise of the authority and discretion conferred upon it. I want to regard it as a court that holds the scales of justice in its hands and executes the law without regard to section, groups, or class. It is a dangerous thing for Congress to attempt to legislate to meet every situation and to prescribe the course of conduct of this important Federal agency. Of course, the substantive law relating to the transportation problem must come from Congress; but in the administration of the law and in the discretion that a body of this kind must possess, Congress should be loath to interfere.

Of course, the commission is not impeccable. Some of its decisions, I have believed, were not sound, and I have criticized the constructions placed by it upon some provisions of the transportation acts. That there should be differences of opinion among members of the commission and among lawyers and legislators is quite natural. I believe that the commission has attempted to do its duty, and I believe that the efforts of Congress should be to strengthen and not to weaken it. If some of its acts are usurpations, or its decisions are clearly wrong, or if its decisions are right but the law is wrong and works injustices, then it would be within the domain of legitimate legislative power for Congress to change the law.

It has been felt by the people of my section of the country that the interpretation placed upon the long-and-short-haul clause has materially injured the Intermountain States. The people have felt that they have been discriminated against; that this discrimination has prevented the development of the resources of that section. They have seen other parts of the country prosper with less resources and natural advantages; and they have discovered, as they have believed, a casual connection between the prosperity of other sections and the adversity of their own section in the discriminating rates to which they have been subjected. The people of Utah and surrounding States are courageous and enterprising. They possess thrift and energy but their economic development has been hampered and arrested by the high freight rates imposed upon them.

As I interpret the long-and-short-haul clause, my section of the country has been discriminated against to the advantage of coastal regions. If Utah, Idaho, Nevada, and other Intermountain States could obtain freight rates, comparable with those existing in other parts of the country, in my opinion they would present an astonishing development and remarkable industrial and business progress. In saying this I do not wish to impute any improper motives to the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor do I wish to derogate in any manner from its prestige and influence. If the long-and-short-haul clause has been misinterpreted, as I believe it has, then Congress is warranted in legislating so that the commission would be unerringly guided along the proper path.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission can not maintain its prestige or expect to engage the respect of the people of this country by the usurpation of power, by a prostitution of the statute itself. There is no need to alter the statute. The need is to alter the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, with all due respect to my friend from Virginia, it has not, possibly, been misadministration, but it has been an administration beyond that which Congress authorized the commission to make. It was a fixed principle of transportation that there was really no excuse to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul over the same system. In other words, Congress could not see why a railroad should charge more for transporting goods 1,000 miles over the same system than 3,000 miles, and the fourth section provided that absolutely; but then we desired to make an exception for some peculiar case that might arise; and what was the reason for the exception? We said that in peculiar cases they might permit the charging of less for the longer haul than for the shorter haul, provided the rate fixed for the longer haul was reasonably compensatory.

That had a definite meaning in the mind of Congress, as Senator Cummins said, at the time that proviso was added. "Reasonably compensatory" meant that it should bring in sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, in addition to the cost, and some reasonable interest on the investment.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in going beyond the law as they did in this case, held that that meant what they termed out-of-pocket cost. In other words, if the rate to the longer point, being less than the rate to the shorter point, would bring them back something in the form of out-of-pocket cost, then it was a justification for getting away from the fourth section, which prohibited in terms charging less for the longer haul than for the shorter haul.

That is what I mean. We are not criticizing the Interstate Commerce Commission except when they go beyond the authority that Congress has given them.

Mr. GLASS. I am criticizing them only when they are plainly usurping authority that Congress has not given them, and that the Congress itself does not possess and could not delegate to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Legislature of Virginia will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC UTILITY CORPORATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Pursuant to the order of the 9th instant, the Chair lays Senate Resolution 83 before the Senate, a resolution authorizing an investigation of public utility corporations. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ferris	McLean	Shipstead
Barkley	Fletcher	McMaster	Shortridge
Bayard	Frazier	McNary	Simmons
Bingham	George	Mayfield	Smith
Black	Gerry	Moses	Smoot
Blaine	Gillett	Neely	Steck
Blease	Glass	Norbeck	Steiwer
Borah	Gooding	Norris	Stephens
Bratton	Gould	Nye	Swanson
Brookhart	Greene	Oddie	Thomas
Broussard	Hale	Overman	Trammell
Bruce	Harris	Phipps	Tydings
Capper	Harrison	Pine	Tyson
Caraway	Hawes	Pittman	Wagner
Copeland	Hayden	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Couzens	Heflin	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Howell	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Deneen	Kendrick	Sackett	Wheeler
Edge	King	Schall	Willis
Edwards	McKellar	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is entirely willing to proceed now with his speech for perhaps the length of an hour. Is that about right?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON. I also understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is willing that the regular order shall be displaced until 3 o'clock, in order to give the Senator from Montana that opportunity. I further understand that the Senator from Montana is willing, if the Senate takes a recess to-day to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock and proceed with the consideration of his resolution, that we may take a vote not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That will be quite satisfactory to me, except that I desire to inquire how many Senators wish to speak on the subject. The Senator from Georgia has expressed a desire to address the Senate on the resolution, and I have asked him to come into the Chamber.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay a vote upon this resolution, and certainly not to object to any agreement which the sponsors of the resolution desire to make; but it would be a little more agreeable if the nature of the controversy could be developed to some extent. I am not a member of the committee which had charge of it. I do not know what is involved in this controversy. Why not let the Senator from Montana proceed, and meet according to the agreement to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and perhaps by 2 o'clock we can agree upon a time to vote? I should like to know what this controversy is about.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am inclined to think that that suggestion is a wise one, because apparently more Senators desire to speak on the resolution than I had supposed.

Mr. WATSON. I have no objection at all to that. All I want is to have an understanding so that the Senator from Utah will know just where he is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if that understanding is arrived at, it should be also understood in laying aside temporarily the alien property bill that the balance of the afternoon will be used in the discussion of the Senator's resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, what is the use of laying aside the alien property bill temporarily? I have just come into the Chamber. There are some people in the gallery who are interested in the bill, and they would like to hear the bill discussed.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to go on with the alien property bill; but there is a resolution here, submitted by the Senator from Montana, and by unanimous consent, granted on Friday, it was to be taken up after the morning business to-day. The Senator from Montana is now upon his feet to address the Senate upon that subject, but he can not get through with his speech in 20 minutes or a quarter of an hour; so an effort has been made to arrive at some conclusion here as to what is the best plan to follow.

I am perfectly willing to lay aside the alien property bill temporarily for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Montana to make his speech on the resolution; and the Senator from Indiana, as I understood him, desired, if possible at this time, to arrive at an agreement for a time to vote to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. On what question?

Mr. SMOOT. On the Walsh resolution. I am perfectly willing to lay aside the alien property bill temporarily; but, if that is done, I hope the balance of the afternoon will be taken up in a discussion of the resolution of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. OVERMAN. How long will the alien property bill be laid aside?

Mr. SMOOT. I give notice now that unless there is a vote on this resolution to-day, I shall insist upon taking up the alien property bill when the discussion is over for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see the purpose of laying aside the Senator's bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the resolution of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know, and I want to be fair about it; but there are people here who want to hear the alien property bill discussed. They are interested in the measure. Why we should postpone it for a resolution, I do not know.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that we already had a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the resolution of the Senator from Montana at the close of the routine morning business. The routine morning business has spun itself out to an interminable length already.

Mr. OVERMAN. The unfinished business is the alien property bill, is it not?

Mr. MOSES. That is correct.

Mr. WATSON. My understanding is, then, that the Senator from Montana is to proceed until 3 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. If no one else shall desire to go on at that time with a discussion of the resolution, I will ask that the unfinished business be proceeded with.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Montana may begin now, the unfinished business can be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock, and the Senator from Montana may continue after that time.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Montana has deep-rooted objection to discussing a matter that is not before the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. WATSON. That is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Utah, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside at 2 o'clock for the purpose of considering the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the Senator proceeds the Chair will state that the pending resolution provides that the committee shall consist of five Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate. The fact that the President of the Senate is financially interested in some public utilities leads him to request that some other method for the appointment of the members of the committee be provided for by the resolution. The Chair has no disposition to evade the responsibilities of his position, but under these circumstances this would seem proper.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the information now given to the Senate was communicated to me a few days ago, and I readily appreciate that in that situation the Vice President should not be asked to make the appointments. Accordingly, I am going to ask leave to amend the resolution by striking out, in line 2, the words "be appointed by the President thereof, and," and to substitute for the same the words "to be elected thereby," so that it will read:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate, to be elected thereby, be hereby empowered and directed to inquire—

And so forth.

I will take up with Senators, should the resolution be adopted, the personnel of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the amendment which the Senator has just suggested provide for a bipartisan committee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it provides for election by the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I gave notice of my intention to offer an amendment to the resolution and, inasmuch as I intend to offer the amendment in a slightly different form from that indicated in the notice, I shall be very glad to state it to the Senator if he desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer this amendment: In line 1, page 1, after the word "Resolved," to strike out all the language down to and including the word "upon," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution and finally on the completion of the investigation upon," so that the resolution would read:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution and finally on the completion of the investigation upon.

Then follows the matter set out in the resolution as it was reported by the committee.

If that amendment should prevail, I would then offer an additional amendment relating very largely to the perfecting of the resolution. The additional amendment would really relate to the form and consist in the elimination of that part of the resolution as it now stands which is applicable only to an investigation by the Senate.

Mr. KING. Simply to harmonize it with the major amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. Simply to harmonize it with the major provisions. I offer the amendment and ask that it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the resolution, the nature of which I dare say is known to all the Members of the Senate, at least in a general way, comes before the Senate at this time upon a unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, recommending the adoption of the resolution by this body with certain amendments, one group of which deals with the general subject of the investigation, the other dealing with the specific provisions of the resolution supplementary to the general investigation and a report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment limiting the expenditure to $30,000.

As to the first group, I have no objection to offer. The amendments suggested are not at all unacceptable. They are as follows: On line 5, page 1, the committee suggest the insertion of the words "doing an interstate business."

On line 1, page 2, it is proposed to strike out the word "such," after the words "stocks of," and insert "two or more"; and in line 2, after the word "corporations," to insert the words "operating in different States"; and in lines 3 and 4 it is proposed to strike out the words "or affiliated with," so that that part of the resolution, if so amended, will read:

(1) The growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public utility corporations operating in different States, and of nonpublic utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator object to having added, before the word "business," in line 5, the words "or international"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that it would read "doing an interstate or international business"?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I should make no objection to that. Indeed, I shall ask that the resolution be amended accordingly.

Mr. President, in my view the scope of the investigation which was really contemplated by the original resolution would not be materially affected by the amendments proposed by the committee; that is to say, possibly if the resolution had been adopted in its original form the committee would have been authorized to investigate the operations of the little electric light company that does business in Rushville, Ind., or in Squash Center, Mo.; but the probabilities are that it would never have done so. It really was intended to authorize the committee to go into the financing and other operations of the great combinations, whose business, whatever it may be, extends into various States.

I desire to say in this connection, however, in explanation of this proposed amendment, that one of these companies may be doing an interstate business in either one of two ways. It may be transporting energy from one State into another State. That is a feature of this business that is growing in importance all the time. When I discussed the subject before the Senate last spring the best information I could obtain was to the effect that only 5 per cent of the total amount of electrical energy developed thus passed from one State to another, but the latest information we have about it is that 9 per cent thus passes across State lines, and as these combinations are developed, and the different plants are tied up, as it is expressed, the passage of energy from one State to another continually increases; that is to say, two entirely independent companies operate in two adjacent States. They never had any relations to each other at all, but the stocks of both of these become acquired by one and the same company, and thereupon it frequently happens that the plant in one State is helped out from the other State when they thus have joint control, so that the amount of business of that character is constantly increasing.

In addition to that—and that is the important thing—many of these corporations are actually engaged in doing an interstate business in the sale of their securities in interstate commerce. That is to say, they organize and put out securities of one kind or another—stocks, or bonds, or other securities—and they offer those to the general public, through advertisements in the papers, through personal solicitation by solicitors, through the stock exchanges and other exchanges, and thus they sell their securities.

There was for some time a question as to whether the sale of securities of that kind, passing from one State to another, constituted interstate business; but the question in our day has practically passed all discussion. The Federal courts have quite generally held in recent times that that constitutes interstate business.

I want this perfectly understood. Because the securities of some of these utility corporations are quoted upon the stock exchanges, and sold by one person to another person, it does not necessarily follow that the corporations themselves are engaged in interstate business. That does not follow by any means. That is to say, a corporation may be organized by half a dozen different individuals who take the stock of the company, and the whole stock of the company, and then it has no more stock to dispose of. Those parties may themselves sell in interstate business. The investigation would not reach transactions of that character.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him just one question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In just a moment. Frequently the companies themselves put out their stock in this way, and those are the transactions which the investigation would reach.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it the Senator's view that the passage of securities from one State to another is interstate business?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it the Senator's view that the main business of the underlying corporation itself is thereby subjected to interstate regulation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. GEORGE. All right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the underlying corporation, whatever that may be, sells its securities in interstate commerce, then its business would be subject to investigation under this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds; which, under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Montana will pardon me, because I do not mean to interrupt him except to get his position clear. It is the Senator's contention, of course, that if the corporation issuing the securities puts them in interstate commerce, then under the resolution the business of the underlying corporation, the corporation issuing the stock and thus putting it into interstate commerce would be subject to investigation. But, as I understand the Senator, the business of the underlying corporation, its main business, whether it be the generation of electric energy or the packing of meat, or anything else, would not be brought within the regulatory powers of the Congress under the interstate commerce clause.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That question relates to what possible legislation might be enacted by Congress with relation to the matter. The question is not directed at all, as I get it from the Senator, to the matter of what the resolution provides for in the way of an investigation.

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is a difference between investigating and legislating.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but I thought it might clarify the whole debate if the Senator was prepared now to say whether it is his view that, merely because the corporation issues and permits to be placed or places its stock in interstate commerce the corporation in the conduct of its underlying business might become subject to the regulation of Congress under the interstate commerce clause.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not at all feel called upon to answer the question at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I regard it as utterly aside from the question as to what the resolution provides for. But I will say to the Senator with respect to that matter that my judgment about it is that the corporation which puts its stock out in interstate commerce is subject to regulation so far as the sale of those securities is concerned, and we may investigate the corporation to find out all about the value of the securities it puts out.

Further than that my present view is that the corporation not doing any other interstate business would not be subject to regulation. But, as I said, any question as to what legislation ought to be enacted with respect to the matter or what power Congress has to legislate with respect to the matter is rather aside from the question as to what the investigation contemplates.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I called attention to the following clause, beginning on page 1:

(1) The growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light, or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public-utility corporations operating in different States.

So that any holding company holding the stocks of public-utility corporations operating in at least two States becomes subject to inquiry here. As I said, I do not regard these amendments as materially restricting the scope of the investigation as it was contemplated at the time the resolution was drafted.

The other amendments on page 2, and down to line 3 on page 3, are formal in character, and there is no objection to those.

Then follows this clause of the original resolution:

The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether and to what extent such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or to influence or control elections.

The committee proposes to add thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives.

With respect to that particular amendment I am unable to give my assent, and I shall ask a vote of the Senate upon the same.

I desire to say in this connection that there was only one purpose in going into the subject of contributions to campaign funds, and that was to ascertain, if it was possible to ascertain the facts, whether, as has been charged, the State commissions or other regulatory bodies authorized by the States had been in their actions to any extent whatever under the influence of these public-utility corporations. If the investigation is ordered, abundant evidence will be at hand. It will be told by men eminent in the financial world and in the domain of economics that with respect to many of these corporations the amount of their net returns indicates that the rates paid are quite above what must be regarded as reasonable.

A gentleman of very high attainments, who has been in the service of one of these great combinations for many years and who is thoroughly conversant with the whole subject, is prepared to come before the committee, if the investigation should be authorized, to testify that from the returns of the corporations themselves their net returns are quite above anything that is necessary in order to secure all necessary capital for extensions and improvements. Bear in mind, I do not assert that that is the case, but I undertake to tell the Senate the evidence which will be before the committee if the investigation is ordered. Of course, that means there is a question as to whether the regulation that we have through the State regulatory bodies is equal to the task before them or not.

While I am talking about that I ought to say that there was submitted to the committee a report from the Federal Trade Commission which flatly declares that the situation is not met at all by the State commissions. Not only that, but in the report we are told that the State commissions of both the States of Massachusetts and of New York have declared that the State commissions are not functioning as completely as is to be expected of them. I read simply this extract from a late report of the Federal Trade Commission:

> The inability of State commissions to regulate such combinations where one of the parties is chartered in another State has been pointed out by the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities in a report to the Massachusetts Legislature (Electrical World, December 18, 1926, p. 1285) and by the New York Public Utilities Commission in connection with the formation of the Northeastern Power Co. (Atlantic Monthly, November, 1926, pp. 684–685). Other State commissions are struggling ineffectually with problems of regulation growing out of pyramided holding companies, controlling the operating companies and its concomitant problem of interstate ownership and interstate business of electric power.
> In his article dealing with this subject Professor Ripley has asserted that "The impotence of State administrative agencies in the face of the growth of these great combinations is indubitable," and has suggested several lines that the State and Federal legislation might take to alleviate the situation.

Mr. President, I am not really particularly concerned about how much money these public-utility corporations have contributed to the election of Senators and Representatives and electors of President and Vice President. In an indirect way that may possibly have some influence upon the local regulatory boards, but it can be only the most indirect influence. What I am particularly concerned in is how much influence they exert toward the election of State regulatory bodies or the appointive power in the various States to which those regulatory bodies owe their origin.

Besides, several times we have investigated the contributions made generally to the election of Senators and Representatives and to campaigns for President of the United States, and I am sure the committee will have no disposition to travel over the ground that has been so well covered by the various investigations in the years 1920, 1924, and 1926.

Mr. President, I am sure, if time would permit, that the Senate would be interested to have read letters which have come to me from various States in the Union telling about the efforts of the great combinations to get control of local operating companies, and particularly to get control of municipally owned utilities. Ordinarily the first application is made to the local city council to purchase from them the property which has been built up by the citizens of the community, and not infrequently it becomes necessary to have a referendum vote on the question; and money is spent freely in those elections in order to accomplish the purchase of the municipally owned plants. It is contributions of that character which it was believed would be enlightening in connection with the question of the operations of these public-utility companies.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me on that point, I quite agree with him that his original language was much better than the committee amendment. If my amendment prevails, or if it does not prevail, I propose to move to strike from the resolution that language; and particularly may I direct the Senator's attention to the fact that this is a simple resolution. It is not a joint resolution. It is not a concurrent resolution. It is a simple resolution offered by the Senator, under which it is specifically proposed by the proviso inserted on page 2 to investigate, by a committee of the Senate, the election of every Member of the House of Representatives. That would strike me as being wholly indefensible, and for that reason, if for none other, I should have moved to strike it out and shall move to strike it out, and shall vote with the Senator on that point whether my amendment prevails or is defeated. I agree with him that his original language as to that feature of the resolution is much the better.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator for so much cooperation. Now, Mr. President, I want to say a few words about the hearing before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I was accorded by that committee every opportunity to submit my views in reference to this matter and was treated with every courtesy. There appeared in opposition to the resolution of investigation, first, the aggregation of utilities companies; second, the representative of the American Manufacturers' Association; and, third, two gentlemen professing to speak for the association of State commissions; likewise there were some representative investment bankers. There appeared before that body no representative of the consumers of electrical energy of any kind whatever; neither was there before that body anyone who professed even to speak for the unfortunate investor in public-utility securities that are offered to the public all over this broad land.

The purpose of the proposed investigation, Mr. President, is to protect two classes of our citizens: First, the 17,000,000 of householders who pay for electric lighting; and, second, the great body of our people who are now putting their savings into the securities of these corporations that are so freely dealt in, so freely dealt in that one of these great combinations has a whole army of solicitors right here in the city of Washington going about from house to house peddling the securities of these corporations to clerks in the departments and school teachers, and that kind of thing. The securities may be perfectly sound; they may be all right, but we owe a duty to these two classes of representative citizens to ascertain the truth about these matters and let them know about them, as well as to legislate, if legislation be necessary—and I hope it will not be necessary—in order to protect them if the publicity does not accomplish that result.

The first group appearing in opposition to the inquiry included the National Electric Light Association, composed of 893 electric operating companies, 324 manufacturing companies, 263 associate companies, and 93 foreign companies; the American Electric Railway Association, composed of 337 operating companies, 35 associate companies, 423 manufacturing companies; the American Gas Association, composed of 469 operating companies, 25 holding companies, 350 manufacturing companies, and 17 associate companies.

They were marshaled by Mr. George B. Cortelyou; and it is well known that these great organizations through their representatives assembled here in the city of Washington before Congress convened last December set up spacious and luxurious quarters here and called to their aid experts in various lines, including experts in securing legislation from Congress and in defeating legislation before Congress.

As I asserted before the committee, Mr. President, there was assembled here the most formidable lobby ever brought together in this city, in my time at least, now for 15 years, representing capital to the amount of nearly $10,000,000,000, and representing what? The general public, the consumers of electric energy, and the purchasers of the securities that are put out by these companies? Not at all; but representing the companies to be investigated.

They were represented before the committee by a former Member of this body, and they furnished us a brief signed, as will be seen in the copy I hold in my hand, by something like, I should say, 50 or 60 legal firms, scattered all over the United States, attorneys for these various utility companies whose operations are to be the subject of inquiry. If the investigation were ordered, there would not be the slightest objection to utility companies having all manner of attorneys come before the committee and say whatever could be said for the companies and for their operation; in fact, they would be invited to do so; but I am saying now that these are the people who are opposing the investigation.

Next we had representatives of investment bankers and investment bankers' associations, who told us that they caused investigation into public-utility securities to be made and therefore there was no necessity for any investigation by a committee of the United States Senate or by any governmental authority at all. But the representatives of the Investment Bankers' Association told us that they dealt only in the bonds and in the preferred stock of these companies, and they paid no attention whatever to the common stock of the companies which is bought and sold generously through the usual avenues of trade.

Then we had the American Manufacturers' Association appearing by one James A. Emery, the employer and coworker of the infamous Mulhall, whose villainies were exposed by a committee of the Senate in the year 1913, chiefly through the energy and surpassing sagacity of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I had thought that after the disclosures then made we had seen the last of Mr. Emery, but he is still with us.

Then there were two members of State commissions, one from the State of Wisconsin and another from the State of Pennsylvania, who came before us to say that the State commissions did not want the investigation to be conducted—at least that was to be inferred—because, forsooth, if the investigation were conducted it might possibly result in Federal legislation upon this subject. Of course, it is said that every good judge desires to extend his jurisdiction and he is always afraid that some of his jurisdiction may be taken away from him. No one can assert that the efficacy of regulation by the State authorities is not under question. I do not undertake to assert at this time that it is not effective, but here is the report of the Federal Trade Commission; here is the report of the commission of the State of Massachusetts and of the commission of the State of New York, who tell us that State regulation does not reach the matter at all. Yet these people do not want us even to inquire into the question as to whether it does or does not. I can not think that their attitude ought to be particularly persuasive with this body.

I might add that abundant information has been gathered by the Federal Trade Commission upon this particular subject, which will be exceedingly enlightening to the Senate and to the public if the investigation shall be ordered.

I ought to say in this connection in reference to the lobby to which reference has been made that the gentleman in charge of the lobby, according to the information coming to us from the newspapers, is Mr. Josiah T. Newcomb. His assistant is Mr. C. A. Beasley. Both of these gentlemen are in some form or other associated with or are officers of the Alabama Power Co. The Alabama Power Co. was some time ago accorded by the Federal Water Power Commission a permit to construct a dam across the Coosa River in the State of Alabama, the project being known as the Mitchell Dam project. It will be remembered that under the provisions of the water power development act of 1920 the public has the right to take over the property at the expiration of the period of the permit, which shall not be greater than 50 years, by paying the actual amount of money invested in the project less depreciation. It becomes, therefore, exceedingly important that we should know just how much money has gone into a project, and, accordingly, whenever a permit is granted by the commission it requires a detailed statement from the permittee of the actual money expended in the enterprise. The Alabama Power Co. was called upon by the commission accordingly to make a report to it as to the amount of money it had expended in this work.

It carried on the work, as is ordinarily done, through a construction company known as the Dixie Construction Co., which was, of course, the same thing as the Alabama Power Co. At the time the proceedings were instituted the stock of the Alabama Power Co. was held by the Alabama Traction, Light & Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Canada. Just why it resorted to Canada for the purpose of incorporating an Alabama company I am unable to apprise the Senate. I dare say, however, it was some consideration different than that which impelled the incorporators of the Continental Trading Co. to seek that jurisdiction.

However, it reported that the total amount expended in the development of this particular project was $10,990,000. The commission sent auditors to audit its books to verify the report thus made by the company, and they reported that according to the books the entire cost of the project, except for a feature hereafter to be referred to, was $5,816,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I did not understand who made that investigation. Will the Senator state who made it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Federal Power Commission. In other words, the auditors for the Federal Power Commission rejected $3,539,000 alleged to have been spent in the construction of this project; and with respect to $1,635,000 the information was not sufficiently complete and specific to enable the commission to say whether it should or should not be allowed, and that subject is now being investigated.

Among the items rejected was $20,000 paid to Josiah T. Newcomb. Just exactly what contribution Mr. Newcomb made to the construction of this project the commission was unable to determine, and consequently rejected it. Seven thousand dollars went to H. J. Pierce, and an indeterminate amount went to Mr. C. A. Beasley.

Mr. President, it is transactions of this character, of which the public has learned more or less, that it is contemplated will fall under the scrutiny of this committee if it is appointed.

Bear in mind, exactly the same kind of a transaction may have occurred—and it is not at all unlikely that it has occurred—in connection with developments over which the Federal Power Commission has absolutely no control whatever. It, of course, can control only those developments which take place in navigable streams or where the development occurs upon the public lands. But it would not be at all surprising if, time and again, representations had been made to State commissions of expenditures of two or three times the amounts that were actually expended in the construction of a particular plant and made the basis not only of charges to the consumer but the basis of securities that are offered in interstate commerce to the public.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have not had an opportunity to examine the report made by the Federal Trade Commission. If the Senator has adverted to this, I shall not ask him to repeat; but, if not, I should like to inquire just the extent of this investigation to see what supplemental investigation is contemplated, or whether it parallels the work already done by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to apprise the Senator.

The Federal Trade Commission acted, Mr. President, under a resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst, as my recollection now serves me, that contemplated an inquiry into what appeared to be the monopolization of the tobacco crop of the State of Kentucky and other States engaged in the production of that plant. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered an amendment to it, directing the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into the question as to whether the General Electric Co. was not, in effect, a power trust; whether it had not monopolized practically all of these power developments in the country.

Acting under that resolution, the Federal Trade Commission conceived that they would be unable to tell whether, indeed, the General Electric Co. was or was not a trust unless they also ascertained what its relations were to every other great combination in the country; so that their investigation went fully into the question of the great combinations that have sprung up, and that control something over 60 per cent of all of the electrical energy developed in this country. They made a report to the effect that at least that amount of energy is thus controlled by something like half a dozen of these groups, and that, so far as they are able to ascertain and determine, there is no actual control among these different groups; so that they found, in effect, that the General Electric Co. was not the so-called Power Trust.

Then they made a further report, which has not yet been published, but of which I have been able to get a proof copy, on various questions of holding companies and the control by State organizations, and so forth, to which I have heretofore referred.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say; but I desire to address myself now to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], which means that instead of this investigation being carried on by a committee appointed by the Senate it shall be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission.

I might say that the resolution here contemplates work practically supplemental to that of the commission. It is not intended to duplicate it at all. The powers conferred upon the commission by the resolution of the Senate did not authorize it to go into the question of the financing of these organizations, and we have no information from them upon that subject, which is the matter that is particularly desired to be gone into.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any reason why that additional power should not be given the commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I am going to offer the reasons.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The reason is that the commission has no power to go into that, and the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia would be entirely nugatory.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I say that the commission would not have any power to conduct the investigation.

Mr. GEORGE. The Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Federal Trade Commission, under a resolution of the Senate; yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think this is the vital proposition, and I suggest the absence of a quorum. I think there should be more Senators present to hear this discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ferris	McKellar	Shipstead
Barkley	Fletcher	McMaster	Shortridge
Bayard	Frazier	McNary	Simmons
Bingham	George	Mayfield	Smith
Black	Gerry	Moses	Smoot
Blaine	Gillett	Neely	Steiwer
Blease	Glass	Norbeck	Stephens
Borah	Gooding	Norris	Swanson
Bratton	Gould	Nye	Thomas
Brookhart	Greene	Oddie	Trammell
Broussard	Hale	Overman	Tydings
Bruce	Harris	Phipps	Tyson
Capper	Harrison	Pittman	Wagner
Caraway	Hawes	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hayden	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Heflin	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Curtis	Howell	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Sackett	Wheeler
Edge	Kendrick	Schall	Willis
Edwards	King	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, recurring for a moment to that part of the resolution which directs an investigation into the sums contributed to influence public opinion and to control elections, I desire to say that the State of California, in which regulation is good, has found it necessary to go into that subject, and it recently passed a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That by order of the railroad commission you are required to supplement your 1927 annual report with a statement showing the amount of money, if any, expended by you for political purposes, the accounts to which such expenditures were charged, and the purposes for which such expenditures were incurred or made. By "expenditures for political purposes" is meant such expenditures, including allocation of compensation of executives, officers, and employees for time devoted to political purposes, as are incurred or made to elect or defeat a candidate for public office, or to support or defeat any measure on the ballot, or to place any measure on the ballot, or to keep it from being placed on the ballot at any State, county, municipal, or other election during the year.

That order of the commission was induced by the fact that a committee of the Legislature of the State of California conducted an investigation into moneys expended in an election theretofore occurring in that State over the question of whether the State should proceed to develop the water powers within the State or not, in which it was disclosed that the public utilities corporations of the State of California had expended for the purpose of defeating the election, as I recall, something like $400,000. Perhaps the senior Senator from California has more definite information on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not recall the exact sum, but it was a very exorbitant amount.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ought to say that the State of Kansas conducted a like investigation and found a like enormous expenditure by the public utilities of that State in an effort to control some legislation there.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I would like to state that I read practically all of the evidence which was taken by the legislative committee in California to which he has referred. There was an enormous amount of money expended; but that was not all. That was an attempt to defeat a referendum, or an initiative, was it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. An initiative.

Mr. NORRIS. They were trying to defeat it, of course, and some of the ordinary employees of the city were summoned. They told, apparently with perfect honesty and fairness, just what happened. The ordinary little employee was called in and told what to do. He was given a certain territory to cover, and it was his duty to make a house-to-house canvass of the people who were in his locality, whom he served in his particular work, whom he knew about; and those employees did that. They spent the time of their employment, for which they were paid their regular salaries; and I suppose no extra money was paid them, but there was an army of that kind of men going around from house to house in every locality, practically, where there were employees, and that covered a good share of the State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And their compensation came out of the regular returns for their service.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the same connection, in my State, a State senator named Milton B. Pitt was fighting the public utilities, taking the farmers' side of things and all that, and all at once he turned up on the other side, and it was disclosed then that he had been hired to make a hundred speeches at $50 a speech on the "patriotic sanctity of the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I understand the Senator to say in broad terms that the Federal Trade Commission has no authority to make this investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What particular part of it—just the part relating to campaign expenditures, or all of it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The whole of it; and the commission has already decided that it has no power to prosecute an investigation into the expenditure of money such as is contemplated in the second part of the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. I will not confute the statement as to that part of it, but I am wondering, if we have the authority, why we can not delegate that authority to a commission already established.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Because we have been restricted by law.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not do that, because we are only a part of the legislative branch.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator now speaking introduced a resolution for the Federal Trade Commission to investigate——

Mr. NORRIS. I did; and has the Senator read the opinion of the Attorney General; and is he familiar with what happened to that resolution?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but they went right on and investigated——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. No; they did not.

Mr. WATSON. And made a report.

Mr. NORRIS. They made a report, but as I remember now, all the part of it referring to the propaganda, election expenses, and so forth, was cut out. They made no investigation as to that. What to my mind was the most important part of the resolution they never investigated.

Mr. WATSON. But they did investigate as to whether there was a power trust engaged in the distribution of electric energy; they did investigate as to whether there was a trust for the distribution of stocks and bonds; and they made a most voluminous report, one which my friend from Montana said the other day was a monumental work.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since I am brought into the discussion, I would like to say, in connection with the resolution which I introduced, in the first place, I could not get it up, but I offered it as an amendment to a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky to investigate the Tobacco Trust. I have it before me, and I could read it; but in that resolution there was a specific provision that the commission should investigate the matter of money spent by the Electric Trust—so called by me—for propaganda purposes, for the purpose of influencing elections; and the Senate will remember the first thing that happened to that resolution. Under the domination of Mr. Humphrey, who was then dominating the actions of the Federal Trade Commission, it was held up for months and months without anything being done. The resolution was referred to the Attorney General for an opinion as to whether the commission had to do any of this work that was provided for in the resolution; and after longer delay, running over a long time, the Attorney General rendered his opinion, in which he said the resolution was all right to an extent, telling how far; but as to the balance, as to the part covering money spent for propaganda purposes and expenditures to control elections, it was beyond the scope and authority of the Federal Trade Commission; that they had no authority to make that investigation; and they never did make it; and for the same reason, it seems to me, they can not make it now.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would like to direct the Senator's attention to this: I do not think it was said that it was beyond the scope——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I was intending to discuss that subject. I think I can give the Senate accurate information about it.

Mr. GEORGE. All right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Federal Trade Commission has no power to make this investigation. It is authorized under the general act creating the commission to make investigations upon the request or direction of either House of Congress, but its activities in that direction exciting some opposition from corporations and others who were subject to investigation, a determined effort was made some years ago to hamstring the Federal Trade Commission. Its appropriations for the purpose were cut down, or were not as liberal as the circumstances, as the commission saw them at least, seemed to warrant, and that not accomplishing the purpose the opponents of the commission got incorporated in the appropriation act, under the appropriation for the support of the commission, a provision like that I read from the act of 1927–28:

> That no part of this sum shall be expended for investigations requested by either House of Congress except those requested by concurrent resolution of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, was not that stricken out in the appropriation act for the next year?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The act does not carry it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate struck that out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking about the law now. The provision is:

> Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for investigagations requested by either House of Congress except those requested by concurrent resolution of Congress, but this limitation shall not apply to investigations and reports in connection with alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

Mr. Humphrey became a member of the commission some time, my recollection is, in the month of January, 1925. During the month of October preceding, the Federal Trade Commission had returned that the Aluminum Co. of America was guilty of a violation of the decree entered against it in 1912 in the District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, and its report with respect to that matter was transmitted to the Attorney General, together with some of the evidence upon which such conclusion was arrived at. It likewise advised the Attorney General at that time that it had in its files a large amount of evidence which it had assembled in support of this finding, which was open to his inspection at any time he saw fit to inspect it.

Before the Attorney General got around to make the inspection, however, Mr. Humphrey went on the commission, and he promptly got a resolution passed by the Federal Trade Commission to the effect that the commission would not permit the Attorney General of the United States to inspect any evidence in its files which it had secured from the company under investigation. A large part of the evidence had been secured by an inspection of the books of the Aluminum Co., and of the correspondence which had passed between the principal house in Pittsburgh and its branch houses throughout the country. That was all sealed up so that the Attorney General could not get it.

At that time the commission had under consideration not only the resolution under which they were then acting but they had four other resolutions of the Senate of the United States directing investigations. The Senate of the United States pursuant to law had directed the Federal Trade Commission to conduct those four investigations, one of which was the investigation referred to pursuant to a resolution offered by the then Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst, inquiring into the Tobacco Trust, amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to include the question as to whether the General Electric Co. was, indeed, the Power Trust.

The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska had two features. It asked for an investigation as to the trust character of the General Electric Co., and then it asked for an investigation into the amount of money that had been expended for the purpose of influencing public opinion with reference to the subject of public ownership or private ownership of public utilities. That part of the resolution as offered by the Senator from Nebraska I have copied in the resolution that is now under consideration word for word, adding thereto also expenditures in connection with elections.

Meanwhile Mr. Humphrey's attention had been called to the rider on the appropriation act of which I have heretofore spoken. He went out into the country and made a speech before the United States Chamber of Commerce in which he had the impertinence—I was going to say impudence—to declare that those resolutions by which he, a subordinate officer of the Government, was directed to conduct these investigations, were simply political in character, and that the commission had no power to conduct the investigations by reason of this rider on the appropriation bill. Then he went before the commission and told them that they ought to send the question to the Attorney General for an opinion as to whether the investigations should be carried on or not.

That request was sent by the President to the Attorney General in the month of May, 1925. Meanwhile, all work was suspended. The economic bureau of the Federal Trade Commission had been going on with those four investigations, or at least with some of them. All work was suspended until an opinion could be secured from the Attorney General of the United States, who took more than five months, everything being held up meanwhile, to determine the simple question as to whether under the rider they could go on with those investigations. Five months and 20 days after he was asked for the opinion he sent down an opinion to the effect that so far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska was concerned, the commission had the authority to make the investigation contemplated in the first part of the resolution, namely, to inquire whether the General Electric Co. was a trust, but that it had no power whatever to conduct the investigation contemplated by the second part of the resolution, which is substantially in the language of the resolution under consideration, as follows:

> The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any effort and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed or to influence or control elections.

Exactly the same line of argument which forbids the Federal Trade Commission to go into that subject forbids it to go into any other questions that are suggested for inquiry in the first part of the resolution under consideration. That is to say, the Attorney General held, and the Federal Trade Commission held, that they can inquire as to whether there have been violations of the antitrust act. The resolution contemplates nothing of that character at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the same provision exist in the act providing for the appropriations until the 1st of next July?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. So, if the resolution should pass, do I understand the Senator to say that under the existing law, which continues until the 1st of next July, they could not do anything?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They could not do a thing.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean that, does he? The question is, if the resolution should pass. The Senator means if it is amended so as to direct the Federal Trade Commission to conduct the investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what I meant. Are we to understand that this investigation, if it be referred to the Federal Trade Commission under the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], would be of such a character that the Federal Trade Commission could not do anything under the present law until after the 1st of July and until the new appropriation bill becomes a law and goes into effect?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They could not turn a hand.

Mr. SWANSON. Then, we would have to wait until after the 1st of July or in the meantime enact a new law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But this has not become the law yet and the commission may or may not have power after the 1st of July next.

Mr. SWANSON. But as I understand it, until the 1st of July, under the existing law providing for appropriations, nothing can be done by the Federal Trade Commission to carry out the investigation suggested by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the fact.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, does not the resolution carry its own appropriation of $30,000?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It carries its own appropriation if the investigation is to be conducted by the Senate and paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Did the Senator read the last appropriation act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Was the Senator a while ago referring to the appropriation act or to the organic act creating the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I referred to both. Under the organic act they may conduct any investigation which may be directed by either House, but the organic act has been amended by the rider on the appropriation bill.

Mr. WATSON. But it is not on the present appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the bill is not yet a law. The law is that no funds available to the Federal Trade Commission shall be devoted to this purpose at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. The rider was stricken out on my motion in committee, and was sustained in conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I commend the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did I understand the Senator from Montana to say that the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission held that the Federal Trade Commission under the law had no authority to investigate the so-called political questions contained in the resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that did not depend upon the restrictions in the appropriation bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, it did depend on the restrictions in the appropriation bill. It was based in the rider on the appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I had here a moment ago the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator was kind enough to hand it to me and I have it here.

Mr. WATSON. Was not the ruling made by Mr. Myers, then in the Attorney General's office and now with the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Myers wrote the opinion, and it expresses the view of the commission.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to hear it.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that if the motion to refer the matter to the Federal Trade Commission prevails, then, under the opinion of the Attorney General and under the statute which exists to-day, until the 1st of July the Federal Trade Commission can do nothing, and then only in case the existing law is repealed or an appropriation is made available in some other manner.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has stated the situation accurately.

Mr. SWANSON. Is that disputed by anybody?

Mr. WATSON. I want to examine it first.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, I would not interrupt the Senator at this time, but I do not agree to the proposition at all that they could not have examined under the original resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator dispute the proposition that both the Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General have ruled otherwise?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand; but it was based entirely on the rider; not the want of power, but simply the want of funds. We will take care of any funds they need.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No money can be drawn from the Treasury of the United States except in pursuance of appropriation authorized by law. That is the provision of the Constitution of the United States. They may or may not get an appropriation.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is perfectly familiar with deficiency appropriation bills that we pass here from time to time. Besides, I want to say, and I shall discuss it later, that in my judgment the Attorney General is wrong in his ruling, because under the Senator's resolution and under the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, to which reference has been made, I think every bit of the inquiry was pertinent to the main fact of which they did have jurisdiction even under the rider on a resolution from either House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to express my gratification at the opinion of the Senator who has just made a statement that coincides with mine entirely. I thought the Attorney General's opinion was wrong, but I have not said so. I felt that until the courts had passed on it it had the effect of a decision of a court, and unless there was some way to appeal from it it was binding and was the law. But I did not like to criticize it, and I never have done so. However, I would like to say to the Senator that the opinion, right or wrong, especially when expressed to a tribunal that wanted the kind of opinion it got, was final and had the effect of a final determination of it by the Supreme Court of the United States. There was no way to appeal.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; but now when we strike the rider from the appropriation act itself, and again direct and empower the commission to go ahead and make the investigation, the Senate is not engaged in child's play and nobody can say that we will not cover any of their work by a deficiency appropriation if it becomes necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But a deficiency appropriation requires the approval of the other House of Congress, and the other House of Congress will then say whether we shall have this investigation or not.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator afraid the other House of Congress will not grant the appropriation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am perfectly satisfied the other House will not give any assistance whatever to this situation.

Mr. GEORGE. If I were the Senator I would not make that statement, particularly when I had incorporated in my resolution, a simple Senate resolution, a proposal to investigate the Members of that body without giving them a right to vote on it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Moreover, if I may be permitted to say, this body ought not for one single moment to tolerate the idea that when it wants to conduct an investigation it must go to the House of Representatives to get an appropriation to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The resolution contemplates an investigation of the election of Members of the House of Representatives. Does the Senator feel that one House of Congress should assume the right to create a committee to investigate the Members of the other House of Congress? Does not the Senator know that that will interrupt the harmonious relationship between the two Houses that is essential to legislation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Arkansas and I are in entire harmony about that matter. Perhaps the Senator was not present when I said I objected to that part of the resolution proposed, not by me, but by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I trust the Senate will reject it.

Mr. WATSON. Was not that included in the Senator's original resolution of investigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator cares to make the resolution more specific by saying that this shall not extend to inquiry into the election of Members of the House of Representatives, I shall not have the slightest objection. Of course, I never contemplated going into that subject. It was only suggested by the Senator's committee that we do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator's resolution contemplated an investigation as to the expenditure of money for the election of all officers of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so, but if the committee did not want that done, they ought to have used appropriate language and have said the investigation shall not extend to contributions made toward the election of any Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WATSON. The original resolution of the Senator from Montana included all elections, but the committee limited the investigation to elections of President, Vice President, and Members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I concur in what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said. The two Houses of Congress in their relationship with each other guard with jealous care an infringement upon the rights one of the other, and I am in full sympathy with that; but the Senator must realize that if we investigate the attempt of a corporation or anybody else to control or influence an election at which Senators are chosen, it would also include the Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then this should be a concurrent or a joint resolution; my mind is entirely clear upon that proposition. One House of Congress ought not to assume exclusively to investigate every other department of the Government, but it ought to give the other branch of Congress an opportunity to participate.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; and we ought to be permitted to investigate elections that apply to Senators without the consent of the other House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. We can easily reach an agreement on that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And we have that power under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But under the Constitution it is questionable whether we have the power to investigate as to the election of municipal officers and State officers and the Members of the House of Representatives. I can conceive that by the adoption of a resolution authorizing by a committee exclusively under the authority of the Senate an investigation of the election of Members of the House of Representatives we may create a condition where there can be no harmonious action between the two Houses. I think this ought to be a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution if we are to investigate all the departments of the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator from Arkansas is discussing this matter in a way that seems to me to lead to the conclusion that he is critical of the author of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, not in any sense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am pleased that the Senator from Arkansas and myself are as one on the question that the investigation ought not to go into the subject to which he has referred, and I am glad to know that he will vote with me, apparently, to disagree to that recommendation of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My information is that the original resolution contemplated an investigation of the election of municipal officers, State officers, and Members of both Houses of Congress, but that the Senate committee's recommendation limits the investigation to Federal officers. I think the investigation ought to be limited to Federal officers; that the resolution ought to be changed to a concurrent or joint resolution, and also that the committee ought to be a joint committee. I make that suggestion. I have, however, no criticism to make of the Senator from Montana, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was thinking about the resolution and not of myself personally.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will allow me, I desire to say that I have not before me a copy of the original resolution, but I attended the hearings in the committee and was present when this amendment was offered and agreed to. My impression is that as originally drawn the resolution did cover all elective officers, but the committee agreed that perhaps we did not have jurisdiction over certain officers but only those that come under the provisions of Federal election laws, and it was agreed that we should restrict the investigation to Federal elections. Of course, there did not arise nor did I hear discussed the unethical proposition of including Members of the House of Representatives. I thought we merely made the resolution apply to Federal positions and to Senators.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that matter can be disposed of when we come to the consideration of that particular amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the amendment proposed by the committee shall be rejected, it will be quite appropriate for anyone to endeavor to limit the scope and effect of the general language of the resolution by an amendment, and probably we shall not be very far apart about that. I merely desire at the present time to call attention to that portion of the opinion of the Attorney General which deals specifically with the subject. It is as follows:

> There is serious question, however, as to the requirement that the Federal Trade Commission shall ascertain and report the efforts, if any, made by the corporations in question, through the expenditure of money or through the control of avenues of publicity.
>
> To influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.
> The relationship of such facts, assuming their existence, to a charge of violation of the antitrust acts is not apparent. Indulging all presumptions in favor of the validity of the resolution under the organic act, I am still unable to find authority for such an inquiry. All other features of the investigation properly may be made.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the opinion of the Attorney General may be printed in the RECORD as an exhibit to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[The opinion appears as an exhibit at the conclusion of the speech of Mr. WALSH of Montana.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, did the Senator state who prepared the opinion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The testimony before the committee of the Senate disclosed that it was actually written in about two or three days by Mr. A. F. Myers, then an assistant in the office of the Attorney General and now a member of the Federal Trade Commission; but it comes to us, of course, over the signature of the Attorney General.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say a while ago that under the decision of the Attorney General the papers and documents of the electric light companies were locked up, so that the Federal Trade Commission was not permitted to see them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I was referring to the evidence in the matter of the Aluminum Co. of America.

Mr. WATSON. It had no reference to this matter?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. WATSON. Then I misunderstood what the Senator said.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I spoke about Mr. Humphrey's activities as a member of that commission.

Mr. WATSON. That had no relation, then, to the fourth amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It had only this relation: I was endeavoring to explain how this question came before the Attorney General for his opinion.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President, quite aside from the question of the power of the commission to conduct the investigation, I must confess some surprise that the suggestion should come from this side of the aisle that this investigation should be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission. Had it come from some member of the stand-pat organization on the other side it would not have occasioned any particular surprise, but for the last three years it has been repeatedly declared that the Federal Trade Commission was packed for the purpose of preventing it from functioning as it was contemplated it should function in the act creating it; and Mr. Humphrey, a member of that commission, has been repeatedly the subject of hostile animadversion on this side of the Chamber, it being asserted that he was there to see that no investigations of any consequence should take place.

Now, Mr. President, I inquire whether this was pure political buncombe on our part and I ask if we are prepared now to confess to the world that we were peddling slander involving the President of the United States for pure political profit? I assert, sir——

Mr. WATSON. What does the Senator say about it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I assert, sir, that Mr. Humphrey ought never to have been appointed to that commission, and I undertake to say from the record that the imputations against him were entirely justified.

Mr. WATSON. But he is on the commission, and I ask the Senator to say what he thinks about either the ability or the capacity or the willingness of the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation such as is proposed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say that it would not have any such desire whatever, so far as Mr. Humphrey could control it.

Mr. WATSON. I am not talking about Mr. Humphrey; I am talking about the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But he is a member of the commission.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly he is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If I may be pardoned, another member of the commission has been the subject of severe criticism by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and they now have his case under consideration.

Mr. WATSON. Who is that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is A. F. Myers. His activity will be the subject for discussion on this floor as soon as the Judiciary Committee shall take action upon the report which is now before it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask the Senator from Montana when Mr. Humphrey was appointed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is he was appointed in January, 1925.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator think that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, including myself, who voted for the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey had just as much right to form an opinion in regard to his qualifications for the office he now fills as the Senator from Montana himself?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BRUCE. The language which the Senator employed was not consistent with such an admission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I certainly did not intend to say anything to the contrary.

Mr. BRUCE. I, for one, voted for the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey after the fullest hearings were held and after I had been completely satisfied that the charges against him were not of such a nature as to justify our disapproval of his appointment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not impeach the honesty or good judgment of anybody who voted for his confirmation.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator expressed his astonishment that anyone on this side of the aisle should have voted for him. I believe that physically I am on this side of the aisle; I am certainly so in a party sense, and I was one who voted for the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey's appointment. The Senator I think forgets the facts when he assumes that every Senator on this side of the House or anything like every Senator on this side of the House was opposed to the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. I adverted to the fact that he has been the subject of the severest kind of criticism upon this floor and it has been asserted that he was on that commission for the purpose of preventing it from functioning.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, we do not agree about those things. I would vote right now to abolish the commission because of Mr. Humphrey's membership on it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Virginia is correct and that the commission ought to be abolished, because of the fact that it is packed with men like Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. GLASS. I have known Mr. Humphrey for 26 years; I served in the House with him; and it is because I do know him that I would vote to abolish the commission because he is a member of it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I think most of the original and real friends of the Federal Trade Commission feel much as does the distinguished Senator from Virginia. I myself differ with him to the extent that I do not believe in abolishing the commission, but I do hope that we can secure the appointment of such men on that commission that it may be conducted in the way in which it was originally intended to function.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about some of the acts of Mr. Humphrey on this commission. I refer to the fact that promptly upon his appointment he sealed up the evidence secured by the commission from the Aluminum Co. of America after the commission had reported to the Attorney General that it was ready to turn it over to him and reported to the Attorney General that, in its opinion, a violation of the decree had taken place. He did not stop there, but he procured a rule to be adopted by the Federal Trade Commission which was to the effect that whenever the commission should issue a complaint against any corporation or company charging it with having violated the law, the complaint should not be made public until after the defendant had filed its answer. Everybody supposed that the proceedings were open to the public. The commission never files a complaint against anybody until, first, its economic division has investigated the facts and until its legal force has advised it that on the facts as reported a violation of law has taken place.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator feel that that is a just criticism of the commission? The other day I asked one of the commissioners—I have forgotten his name—who was before the Appropriations Committee, "Why is your commission so unpopular?" I said, "It is, is it not, or has been?" He said, "Yes." He said, "The reason why is because many complaints have come to us from trade rivals, and we used to give out this information to the public, and that was spread as a sort of propaganda by the rivals." Is it not a wise thing to protect the defendant until there has been found evidence to justify publicity?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can start any kind of suit against the Senator from New York, making all kinds of charges against him, and file it in the clerk's office, and issue a subpœna or a summons upon it. What can he do about it?

Mr. COPELAND. Even so, I should not think that was any particular reason why, in the rivalries of trade, where one business man thought another was infringing upon his rights——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator overlooks the fact that an investigation is conducted by the Federal Trade Commission before it issues the complaint.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that that is true. Of course, the Senator from Montana thinks it is wise that there should be that investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. That was not the practice, however, two or three years ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; that was always the practice. The complaint came in that the particular company was engaged in unfair practices. It was turned over to the economic division. They were told to "go into this matter, inquire into the facts about it, and report to us."

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, Mr. President; but that is not all that was done. It was turned over to the public at the same time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; oh, no.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I was misinformed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator must have been. They then inquire into the facts. Of course, it is an ex parte inquiry, and they turn over the facts which they have assembled to the legal department, and the legal department says, "Assuming that these are the facts, there is a violation of law here," and thereupon they issue the complaint. That was prevented.

But the next thing, Mr. President, was this—and I will ask the Senator from New York kindly to give his attention to this: The next thing was that after a complaint had been issued, they gave the defendant against whom the proceedings were instituted an opportunity to come in and be heard privately by the commission with respect to the facts in connection with the matter.

Take the Continental Baking Co., for instance: The same course was gone through. The economic division reported that there was a violation of section 7 of the trade commission act by the acquisition by the Continental Baking Co. of the stocks of 16 different baking corporations. They then directed that a complaint issue against it, after obtaining the advice of their attorney. That was not made public; but Mr. Barber was given an opportunity to come before the commission in private, not publicly at all, and tell the commission why that complaint should not be dismissed. In that particular case, after he got through, they determined that they would not dismiss the complaint, that they would go on with it. That was another.

Then Mr. Humphrey sought to interrupt the proceedings on these four resolutions of the Senate by getting the Attorney General to render an opinion in accordance with his views that the commission had no power to go into the matter, and made his views public in a speech before the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. President, these various acts of Mr. Humphrey in undertaking to limit and restrict, if not utterly destroy, the usefulness of the commission satisfied me that so far as he was able to control the situation there will not be any investigation of any value.

Now I want to advert to just one or two objections which have been made to the Senate giving its approval to this resolution.

It has been said, and I violate no confidences at all when I say that it is the common talk on newspaper row, that this resolution will not be adopted by the Senate, because neither party wants it adopted, because it will dry up the source of campaign funds for the next election. Mr. President, if it does anything of that kind that is another reason, to my mind, why it should be adopted.

If it be true that the course and conduct of these companies has been such as to lead to the belief that they are supplying the sinews of war for the two great political parties, the sooner the country knows about it the better it will be for everybody concerned. I am in no situation to say whether it is true or whether it is not true. However, it has been said, and possibly there is an implied threat in it, that Mr. Samuel Insull, whose name has attained some notoriety in connection with transactions heretofore investigated by the Senate, contributed to the Wilson campaign fund in Chicago in 1916, when I was the manager of the campaign at that place, and that his contribution was made to a lieutenant of mine.

That does not frighten me a bit. The matter of the accumulation of funds in Chicago was not intrusted to me. I had nothing to do with it. I spent the money all right enough. If a dollar was contributed by Mr. Insull, I never knew anything about it, if I even knew of his existence at that time; and I am perfectly willing that the whole matter may be gone into by any committee of the Senate at any time.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about this matter at the present time.

EXHIBIT

[Re: Opinion on the powers and duties of the Federal Trade Commission in the conduct of investigations under resolutions of the United States Senate]

(Prepared by A. F. Myers; reviewed by P. R. Chandler; approved by William J. Donovan and William D. Mitchell)

OCTOBER 24, 1925.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated May 5, 1925, inclosing a communication from the Federal Trade Commission and requesting that I render an opinion on the questions propounded therein. The questions relate to the powers and duties of the Federal Trade Commission in the conduct of investigations under four designated resolutions of the United States Senate. As to these resolutions, severally, the following questions are asked:

1. Is the commission empowered by subsection (d) of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act to make the entire investigation called for by the resolution?

2. Is the commission empowered by said subsection to make any part of the investigation directed by the resolution; and if so, what part or parts thereof is the commission empowered to investigate?

3. If the inquiry directed by the resolution is partly within and partly without the power of the commission to investigate under the provisions of said subsection, may the commission legally proceed with that part of the investigation which is legally within such power regardless of the fact that part of the investigation directed is legally without such power?

4. If the Attorney General shall be of opinion that said resolution, or certain parts thereof, confer no power upon the commission to proceed with such investigations or parts thereof, do subsections (a) and (b) of section 6 of said act confer power upon the commission, proceeding as upon its own motion, to make such investigations or parts thereof?

I note that a preliminary question is suggested in the papers accompanying the submission regarding my authority to render this opinion. I need only say that the practice of rendering opinions to the President for the guidance of independent establishments is of such long standing and is instanced by so many opinions by my predecessors that I must regard it as settled and proper.

A resolution by one of the two Houses of Congress is not legislation and can not add to or detract from the powers already possessed by the commission under preexisting statutes. United States v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. (236 U. S. 318; Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Co. (264 U. S. 298, 283 Fed. 999); Federal Trade Commission v. Baltimore Grain Co. (284 Fed. 886); statement by Senator Cummins (51 CONG. REC. 11451). Power to make the investigations in question must, therefore, be found in the subsections of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act (copied in the order of their importance in this inquiry) and in the current appropriation act, approved March 3, 1925 (ch. 468, 43 Stat. 1203).

SEC. 6. That the commission shall also have power—

(d) Upon the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

(a) To gather and compile information concerning and to investigate from time to time the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

(b) To require, by general or special orders, corporations engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, or any class of them, or any of them, respectively, to file with the commission in such form as the commission may prescribe annual or special, or both annual and special, reports or answers in writing to specific questions, furnishing to the commission such information as it may require as to the organization, business, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, partnerships, and individuals of the respective corporations filing such reports or answers in writing. Such reports and answers shall be made under oath, or otherwise, as the commission may prescribe, and shall be filed with the commission within such reasonable period as the commission may prescribe, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission.

The appropriation act:

No part of this sum shall be expended for investigations requested by either House of Congress, except those requested by concurrent resolution of Congress, but this limitation shall not apply to investigations and reports in connection with alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

An investigation which the commission may prosecute pursuant to subsection (d) must relate to an alleged violation of the antitrust acts by some corporation. The above-quoted provision of the appropriation act is but a reaffirmation of the requirements of subsection (d).

The question to be determined in each instance is whether the resolution is so worded as to allege a violation of the antitrust laws by any corporation. The courts have not defined with what definiteness and certainty an alleged violation of the antitrust acts must be charged in the resolution, Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Co., supra, involved a petition for writ of mandamus to compel the respondents, American Tobacco Co. and others, to deliver to the commission certain books, documents, and correspondence. The commission was proceeding (a) under complaints of the use by respondents of unfair methods of competition contrary to the trade commission act, and (b) in pursuance of a resolution of the United States Senate. The resolution (S. 129, dated August 9, 1921) merely directed that the commission make a broad investigation as to the prices for certain grades of tobacco. The court in rejecting the resolution as a source of power said (p. 305):

[NOTE.—"Corporation" is defined by section 4 to mean "any company or association incorporated or unincorporated which is organized to carry on business for profit and has shares of capital or capital stock, and any company or association, incorporated or unincorporated without shares of capital or capital stock, except partnerships, which is organized to carry on business for its own profit or that of its members."]

"The Senate resolution may be laid on one side, as it is not based on any alleged violation of the antitrust acts within the requirements of section 6 (d) of the act." (United States v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 236 U. S. 318.)

No procedure is prescribed for alleging violations of the antitrust acts in the resolutions of the House or Senate, and no authority exists for holding such bodies to fixed forms. The debates accompanying the adoption of Senate Resolution 329, set out in connection with the consideration of that resolution, show that the Senate itself has declined to be bound to any formal procedure in alleging violations of the antitrust laws.

A main purpose of the Federal Trade Commission act was to enable Congress, through the Trade Commission, to obtain full information concerning conditions in industry to aid it in its duty of enacting legislation. That purpose was emphasized in the proceedings attending the passage of the act (H. Rept. 533, 63d Cong., 2d sess.; S. Rept. 597, 63d Cong., 2d sess.); and in the debates the commission was sometimes likened to a committee of Congress (statement of Congressman Stevens, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 51st Cong., p. 14935).

Resolutions directing investigations pursuant to section 6, subsection (d), are to be limited in their scope to the ascertainment of facts which reasonably and logically tend to show whether or not the antitrust acts are being violated by any corporation. The existence or nonexistence of a violation of such acts may be disclosed by acts committed by the corporations under investigation and the effect of such acts upon interstate trade and commerce. The investigations should not in any case be enlarged to include an inquiry into any matter which does not have a direct bearing upon the question whether interstate trade and commerce are being unlawfully monopolized or restrained.

In considering particular resolutions it is not enough to stop with the bare language thereof; resort must be had to the proceedings attending their adoption.

First. Resolution 163, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session: This resolution on its face requires, primarily, an economic investigation of the milling and baking industries, and incidentally a report of the facts (if any) tending to show contracts, combinations, etc., in restraint of trade. There is no direct allegation that any corporation or corporations is violating the antitrust acts. But the resolution as introduced contained a preamble reciting a series of alleged facts fairly calculated to bring the investigation within the scope of the commission's authority under subsection (d) of section 6. Certain of these recitals were stated so positively that their adoption in that form would have amounted to a declaration by the Senate that they were true. A Senator having objected to the resolution on the ground stated, the preamble was stricken out (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., p. 2541). The preamble follows:

[NOTE.—The resolutions are set out in an appendix to this opinion.]

"Whereas the price of bread is being maintained at substantially the level of war prices while the price of wheat has declined to pre-war levels; and

"Whereas bread made by American flour is selling in England at an average retail price of 4 cents a pound, as compared with an average of 8.7 cents in the United States; and

"Whereas the financial reports of flour milling and baking companies so far as published disclose enormous profits during recent years; and

"Whereas excessive bread prices have caused a decrease in the consumption of bread in the United States amounting to 44 loaves per person per year; and

"Whereas this reduction of bread consumption has largely decreased the domestic market for wheat and thus contributed to the distress and widespread bankruptcy of wheat farmers; and

"Whereas bread prices in American cities are artificially maintained at excessive levels, apparently by combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade; and

"Whereas there has recently been formed a huge merger of baking companies; and

"Whereas the production and distribution of bread has ceased to be a local industry and has in large measure assumed the character of interstate commerce."

While the investigation is concerned more with the effects of monopoly than with the means by which accomplished, it is with the effects of monopoly that Congress is mainly concerned. The artificial enhancement and depression of prices are the indicia of monopoly. Whether or not the control acquired or exerted by a corporation or group of corporations over interstate trade and commerce is monopolistic in scope depends at least in some measure upon the power to control or affect prices. I am of opinion, therefore, that the commission may, as a part of its investigation of alleged violations of the antitrust law by baking and milling corporations, ascertain and report the facts in reference to costs, prices, and profits set out in the early part of the resolution.

The failure to specify any corporation by name can not be given controlling effect, as Congress might properly be reluctant to charge a corporation with violating the law in a public resolution. Such allegation serves merely as a basis for directing an investigation, and the better practice clearly would be to await the results of the investigation before publicly citing the corporation.

Second. Resolution 329, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session, is in two parts, each relating to a separate investigation of a different industry. The resolution as first introduced related only to the tobacco industry. That portion of the resolution evidently was drafted with an eye to the requirements of section 6, subsection (d), of the act. The letter from the commission indicates that it entertains no doubt as to its duty to make the tobacco investigation and that such investigation is well under way. I need only say that I concur in the view taken by the commission in that regard.

The second part of the resolution relates to an investigation of the General Electric Co. and its subsidiary and allied companies. This was originally introduced as a separate resolution (S. Res. 286) during the debate on the Muscle Shoals power bill (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong. p. 939). In advocating the adoption of the resolution, Senator NORRIS said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., p. 2200):

"I have already placed before the Senate, and other Senators have likewise placed before the Senate, evidence which it seems to me ought to convince any reasonable man that such a monopoly or combination exists.

"It is a common practice here when there is at least reasonable ground to believe that such a state of affairs exists, for a resolution providing for an investigation either by a committee or some other organization equipped to undertake it to be introduced for the purpose of the necessary inquiry in order to ascertain the information and to report. That has been true, so far as I can remember, without an exception. I can not understand, Mr. President, when, as in this case, for hours and hours the Senate has been given evidence showing the names of corporations and individuals that interlock and spread all over the country, why there should be opposition to the adoption of this resolution."

Thereafter the resolution was proposed as an amendment to the tobacco resolution (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., pp. 3379). Speaking in favor of the amendment Senator NORRIS repeated in substance the arguments previously made in support of the separate resolution. The question as to the character of the allegation of alleged violation of the antitrust act needed to authorize an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission was raised by Senator BRUCE (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., pp. 3390–3391):

"Mr. BRUCE. * * * But even in its present form as an amendment it still embodies the proposition that the Federal Trade Commission is to be instructed to institute an investigation into the operations of the General Electric Co. merely because a Member of the Senate has alleged on the floor of the Senate that the General Electric Co. is engaged in illicit practices."

* * * * * * *

"Did the Senator ever produce any testimony on that subject?

"Mr. NORRIS. Speaking as a lawyer, technically I did not, because I was not sworn or put on the witness stand, but I produced for hours and hours allegations as to the subsidiary companies, the ownership of stock, interlocking directorates, and so forth.

"Mr. BRUCE. * * * The point I am making is, that while I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea of investigating any and all abuses which may be perpetrated by any business combination, I do think that such an investigation ought to be preceded by legal testimony. I am speaking now of testimony in the strict sense of the word, because we know that there is all the difference in the world between mere allegations and formal testimony making out a prima facie case of wrongdoing."

Senator BRUCE made the same suggestion concerning that part of the resolution relating to the tobacco industry. The action of the Senate in adopting the resolution and the amendment may be regarded as a determination that its procedure does not call for any formal allegation of a violation of the antitrust laws, and that the charges of a Senator, on the floor, are sufficient.

The recitals of the second part of the resolution allege a violation of the antitrust acts by a named corporation and its subsidiaries. For the most part the investigation directed is appropriate to develop truth or falsity of the charge. In carrying out this resolution regard should be had for the admonition already given to the effect that the inquiry should be limited to facts and circumstances tending to show any unlawful restraint of interstate trade and commerce. Under the provisions of the antitrust acts only restraints upon the production of electric energy for transmission over State lines and upon the interstate transmission of electric energy, or the monopolization thereof, may be properly investigated under the resolution in question.

There is serious question, however, as to the requirement that the Federal Trade Commission shall ascertain and report the efforts, if any, made by the corporations in question, through the expenditure of money or through the control of avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

The relationship of such facts, assuming their existence, to a charge of violation of the antitrust acts is not apparent. Indulging all presumptions in favor of the validity of the resolution under the organic act, I am still unable to find authority for such an inquiry. All other features of the investigation properly may be made.

Third. Resolution 28, Sixty-ninth Congress, special session, was adopted at the special session of the Sixty-ninth Congress practically without debate. It recites that a former report of the Federal Trade Commission discloses the existence of 150 "open-price association" or associations "distributing or exchanging price information"; and that such associations may exert a large influence in maintaining prices at an exhorbitant level. The commission is directed to report the number, names, character, and importance of the open-price associations; the extent to which such associations have enabled members to maintain uniform prices; whether such open-price associations engage in other activities, and, if so, the nature and effect thereof "with respect to alleged violations of the antitrust law."

Trade associations, or "open-price" associations probably are corporations within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission act, or if not, are composed of corporations.

Doubtless their operations, in many important particulars, affect interstate trade and commerce. The commission in proceeding under the resolution should not extend its investigation to include matters or things not affecting interstate commerce and consequently having no possible bearing upon alleged violations of the antitrust acts.

The resolution calls for an investigation which ought to be of value to Congress in considering what legislation, if any, is required to cope with a new form of business organization which, while possessing valuable features, has presented many difficult problems under the Federal antitrust laws. I am aware that the discussion concerning trade associations has centered about their legality under the antitrust acts, and that such associations have been the subject of four important decisions of the Supreme Court under those laws. I am of opinion, therefore, that the investigation called for by Resolution 28 is appropriate to disclose the existence or nonexistence of alleged violations of the antitrust acts by corporations as defined in the fourth section of the trade commission act and should be made.

Fourth. Resolution 34, Sixty-ninth Congress, special session, also was adopted without debate. The preamble asserts the economic value of cooperative organizations; recites that information concerning such organizations is not available in comprehensive form; and states that it is "frequently charged" that such cooperative organizations are being discriminated against and injured by various corporations and trade associations "in alleged violation of the antitrust acts." The first subdivision of the resolution calls for a purely economic investigation as to the value and importance of cooperative organizations. Standing alone, this part of the resolution would fail. However, I am not prepared to say that such an investigation is not a proper concomitant of the investigation of the charge of unlawful discrimination against such organizations. The vice of the alleged unlawful practices can be best judged in the light of the facts concerning the importance and value of the organizations subjected to such discrimination. In my opinion, the commission may investigate and report concerning the growth and importance of cooperative associations, and their relative efficiency as compared with other distributors, for the purpose of showing the extent and value of the interstate trade and commerce alleged to be unlawfully restrained.

You will recognize that I can not forecast all of the problems which may arise in carrying out the somewhat vague directions of the resolutions. Minor questions as they arise should be resolved by the commission in the light of the principles set out in this opinion. The test, whether or not a particular line of inquiry should be followed, would seem in each instance to be whether it will disclose material evidence of a violation of the antitrust acts.

The foregoing discussion covers all questions propounded by the Federal Trade Commission save the fourth. Since I have held that the resolutions (with the exception of one feature of Resolution 329) may be complied with under the provisions of subsection (d) of section 6, there really is no occasion to consider what would be the power of the commission to proceed of its own motion under the other subsections mentioned.

It may be noted that the limitations of the current appropriation act relate only to investigations requested by either House of Congress, and it would seem that the commission would be free to proceed under subsection (a) to the extent deemed appropriate or desirable in conducting the investigations in question. However, the provisions of that subsection are not as broad as those of subsection (d), in that they authorize the commission to investigate only corporations engaged in interstate commerce, regardless of the effect of the operations of such corporations in restraining or monopolizing such commerce. It is fair to assume that the Senate, in adopting the resolutions, intended that the investigations should be made under subsection (d), which makes provision for just such investigations.

The provisions of subsection (b) are procedural and add nothing to the power to undertake investigations conferred by subsections (a) and (d). As the right of the commission under said subsection to require written answers to its interrogatories is in issue in a case now pending in the Supreme Court, it would be inappropriate for me to express any opinion regarding the exercise of such powers. This opinion, moreover, is based upon the premise that the investigations called for may be conducted and the desired information obtained with the cooperation of the corporations affected or by orderly processes; and I expressly disclaim any intention of passing even inferentially upon any question as to the power of the commission to compel the production of documentary evidence or the limitations thereon.

Respectfully,

JOHN G. SARGENT,
Attorney General.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

APPENDIX

Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, Senate Resolution 163, February 16, 1924

Resolution

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate the production, distribution, transportation, and sale of flour and bread, including by-products, and report its findings in full to the Senate, showing the costs, prices, and profits at each stage of the process of production and distribution, from the time the wheat leaves the farm until the bread is delivered to the consumer; the extent and methods of price fixing, price maintenance, and price discrimination; the developments in the direction of monopoly and concentration of control in the milling and baking industries, and all evidence indicating the existence of agreements, conspiracies, or combinations in restraint of trade.

Sixty-eighth Congress, second session, Senate Resolution 329, February 3 (calendar day, February 6), 1925

Resolution

Whereas it has been stated openly that an agreement exists between the American Tobacco Co. and the Imperial Tobacco Co. of Great Britain whereby the American Tobacco Co. will sell no tobacco in Great Britain and the Imperial Tobacco Co. will sell no tobacco in the United States; and

Whereas such an agreement gives the Imperial Tobacco Co. a practical monopoly on certain types of tobacco grown in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina and a special interest in certain types of tobacco grown in Kentucky and purchased in the United States by the local resident agents of the Imperial Tobacco Co. and processed in the United States in its plants, and the same agreement gives the American Tobacco Co. a special interest in other types grown in those States; and

Whereas the growers of leaf tobacco have formed great cooperative organizations, known as the Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, the Dark Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, comprising an aggregate of more than 270,000 grower members for the cooperative marketing of the tobacco of their members; and

Whereas such cooperative associations have been organized along lines encouraged by this Government and have been financed in part by the War Finance Corporation and the intermediate credit banks; and

Whereas the American Tobacco Co. and the Imperial Tobacco Co. are opposed to the formation of cooperative marketing associations among tobacco growers and desire to destroy them, and have attempted to discourage members by purchasing leaf tobacco from nonmember growers at higher prices than tenders theretofore made by such cooperative associations, and have induced and encouraged breaches of contracts between members and the cooperative associations contrary to the terms of the members' agreements with the associations; and

Whereas the said companies have practically boycotted the said cooperative associations and, by reason of their special interest in certain types, have caused great damage and harm to the cooperative associations; and

Whereas the aforesaid agreement stops competition between the said companies in the purchase from the growers of the types of tobacco used by the American Tobacco Co. and the Imperial Tobacco Co. and enables one company or the other to control the purchase and marketing of these types; and

Whereas acts on the part of these two companies cause leaf tobacco to be diverted from the cooperative associations to these companies, directly or indirectly, in spite of the contracts between the growers and the cooperative associations; and

Whereas such conduct on the part of such companies appears to be unfair practice in pursuance of an illegal agreement to restrict and restrain competition and trade in leaf tobacco in interstate commerce: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the President of the United States on or before July 1, 1925, the present degree of concentration and interrelation in the ownership, control, direction, financing, and management through legal or equitable ownership of stocks, bonds, or other securities or instrumentalities, or through interlocking directorates or holding companies, or through agreements, or through any other device or means whatsoever by the American Tobacco Co. and the Imperial Tobacco Co.; and also particularly to investigate the methods employed by these companies in their fight against cooperative marketing associations and any boycott thereof; and also particularly to investigate any agreements or arrangements made by said companies to embarrass or injure any such cooperative associations or to cause discouragement or breaches of contracts between growers, members, and the said cooperative associations; and

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the said Federal Trade Commission in making such investigation to have access to all official reports and records in any or all of the bureaus of said Treasury Department; and

Whereas it has been alleged on the floor of the Senate during the course of a debate upon a bill relating to the disposition, operation, management, and control of the water-power and steam-power plant, with their incidental lands, equipment, fixtures, and properies, that a corporation known as the General Electric Co. has acquired a monopoly or exercises a control in restraint of trade or commerce in violation of law of or over the production and distribution of electric energy and the manufacture, sale, and distribution of electrical equipment and apparatus: Therefore be it

Resolved further, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the Senate to what extent the said General Electric Co., or the stockholders or other security holders thereof, either directly or through subsidiary companies, stock ownership, or through other means or instrumentalities, monopolize or control the production, generation, or transmission of electric energy or power, whether produced by steam, gas, or water power, and to report to the Senate the manner in which the said General Electric Co. has acquired and maintained such monopoly or exercises such control in restraint of trade or commerce and in violation of law.

The commission shall also ascertain and report what effort, if any, has been made by the said General Electric Co. or other corporations, companies, organizations, or associations, or anyone in its behalf, or in behalf of any trade organization of which it is a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to permit the said Federal Trade Commission to have access to official reports and records pertinent thereto in making such investigations.

Sixty-ninth Congress, special session of the Senate, Senate Resolution 28, March 17, 1925

Resolution

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission, in its annual report for 1922, states that at the request of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry the commission undertook a special investigation concerning the activities of trade associations, and found by response to its questionnaires that there were 150 open-price associations, or those distributing or exchanging "price information"; and

Whereas the commission reported "most of the open-price associations also distributed or exchanged information on other features of business, such as orders received, purchases, production, stocks, cost of production and merchandising, and matters of general interest to members"; and

Whereas such associations may exert a large influence in maintaining prices at an exorbitant level, particularly in the case of manufacturing concerns the products of which are protected by a high tariff duty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to investigate and to report to the Senate at the next session of Congress—

First. The present number and nature of the open-price associations, the names of such associations, the number of their members thereof, and the importance of such associations in the industry.

Second. To what extent, if any, the effect of such open-price associations has been to maintain among members thereof uniform prices to wholesalers or retailers, or to secure uniform or approximately uniform increases in such prices.

Third. Whether such open-price associations engage in other activities; and if so, the nature and effects thereof, with respect to alleged violations of the antitrust laws.

Sixty-ninth Congress, special session of the Senate, Senate Resolution 34, March 17, 1925

Resolution

Whereas the successful development of cooperative organizations in production, distribution, and consumption affords needed opportunities for increasing the income of the producer, especially the farmer, and for diminishing the cost of living of the consumer, and appears to be of great public benefit, as shown by the experiences of numerous foreign countries; and

Whereas the President's agricultural conference recommends constructive Federal assistance in the development of producers' marketing organizations; and

Whereas complete and conclusive information with respect to the economic advantages or disadvantages of the cooperative movement in this country as compared with other types of marketing farm products has not been made available in comprehensive form; and

Whereas it is frequently charged that various cooperative organizations of farmers engaged in marketing grain, tobacco, cotton, livestock, and other products, as well as consumers' cooperative purchasing organizations, are being discriminated against and injured by various corporations and trade associations, in alleged violation of the antitrust laws: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an inquiry (1) into the growth and importance of cooperative associations, including particularly the costs of marketing and distribution of such cooperatives as compared with the corresponding costs of other types of distributors, and (2) into the extent and importance of the interferences with and obstructions to the formation and operation of cooperative organizers of producers, distributors, and consumers by any corporation or trade association in alleged violation of the antitrust laws, and to report thereon with recommendations for legislation, or other remedial action, if the same appears necessary.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I expect to discuss the amendment which I have offered to the resolution, but I am not in a position to do so this afternoon. I wish, however, to draw attention to some facts while they are fresh in mind.

If anything is needed to convince one that an investigation so far-reaching in its consequences and affecting so many and so varied interests should not be made by a Senate committee, the degree of immoderation displayed in the discussion of the matter is itself sufficient proof.

I do not criticize the Senator from Montana. I entertain for him the highest opinion. I do not wish to interpose an objection to any proper investigation of the utilities enumerated in this resolution. My amendment provides for an immediate investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, with partial reports to the Senate within each 30 days, and a final report upon the completion of the work. It contemplates no delay. It contemplates a fair, a calm, a dispassionate investigation of a great business or industry of the country.

The objection that the Federal Trade Commission is not a proper tribunal to make this investigation is based largely upon the poor opinion of the Senator from Montana of a member of the commission; and yet the Senator reads here, as pertinent evidence upon which he asks to have the investigation proceed, excerpts from the report of the Federal Trade Commission. Take out of the Senator's showing before the Interstate Commerce Committee—indeed, take out of his argument here today—such excerpts as he takes from the Federal Trade Commission's reports, and there is not a prima facie case made for the investigation.

I am not opposing the investigation, however. I am simply calling attention to the fact.

Then the Senator is led afield to make the statement that no one contemplates or imagines that the other House of the Congress will sanction an investigation, though an investigation be demanded by the facts. The declaration in effect is made that the House would withhold an appropriation of money to cover the expense of an investigation ordered by this body upon the most substantial grounds.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if that has not been done already in reference to the investigation that was directed by the amendment presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no. I will get to that in the course of argument, Mr. President.

The Senator objects now to the resolution going to the Federal Trade Commission, when the original resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], under which a searching investigation was made, selected the commission to make it, and Mr. Humphrey was then a member of the commission.

The Senator is disturbed by the presence of lobbyists. He is not dissuaded from his course, and no one can dissuade him from his course, but the Senator from Montana ought to be willing to concede to others here the same strength to resist the seductive influences of lobbyists and the same disposition to do their duty as they see it regardless of consequences. Mr. President, it matters little whether the lobby is in the press gallery, representing a type of newspaper, or in the house somewhere on the street described by the Senator.

In the beginning of this inquiry into the utilities the Senate selected its own jury. It sent the resolution demanding an inquiry into the utilities named in the pending resolution to the Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission has now made its report.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator from Georgia that the report was stated by the Senator from Montana in the course of the proceedings before the committee to be a monumental report?

Mr. GEORGE. Not only is that true, Mr. President, but the Senator invoked it as the basis of the right to continue and to extend the investigation. I am not criticizing the Senator and I am not defending the Trade Commission, but it is passing strange that we now have so little faith in the Federal Trade Commission. Upon the motion of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska the Senate sent the original resolution to the Federal Trade Commission, and the author of the pending resolution offered as the most pertinent evidence tending to sustain it the report of the Federal Trade Commission.

I do not know the members of the commission. A member of that body may be corrupt. I know that it has made its report; I know that the report is not partial to the utilities investigated. It covers practically the ground that the pending resolution seeks now to have re-covered.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator just a moment, I will call his attention to the fact that one of the recent accessions to this commission is a former chief justice of Arkansas.

Mr. GEORGE. I so understand.

Mr. BRUCE. Who, as I understand it, is a jurist of the very highest repute in point of both character and ability.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can not allow the statement just made by the Senator from Georgia to pass without comment, if he will indulge me for a moment. I do not think anything I said here could be interpreted as signifying that I thought any member of the Federal Trade Commission was corrupt.

Mr. GEORGE. If I used the word "corrupt," and the Senator did not, I withdraw it; but the Senator's whole objection is that he can not expect a fair report from this commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Humphrey is of such a bent of mind about this matter, as his whole record shows, that I would not expect to get a fair report.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I need not repeat what I have said about the Federal Trade Commission. I am merely calling attention to the work actually performed by the commission in this case.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator claim that the Federal Trade Commission under the law could or did investigate all the matters set out in the resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I will get to that in a moment. I did not expect to go on this afternoon, as I stated in opening.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am perfectly friendly to the Federal Trade Commission myself, but I do not think they have authority to make such an investigation as we are asking here.

Mr. GEORGE. I think they have full authority, and that they declined to complete the investigation called for by the Norris resolution because of a rider attached to the appropriation bill which denied the commission the right to use the money appropriated for that purpose; but I will discuss that in just a moment.

What I am trying to do is to state the facts in this case. Two years ago the Senate solemnly selected its own jury, and it was selected by the Senator from Nebraska. His action was concurred in, of course, by the author of this resolution and by all of the then sitting Members of the Senate present; I do not recall that there was a vote against it. The Federal Trade Commission did enter upon the work, as required by the resolution, and it has completed its work at this time.

Without waiting for the Federal Trade Commission to complete its work—and the Senator from Nebraska has not read its report—without waiting for the Federal Trade Commission to complete its work, and the Senator from Montana had not read its report when he offered this resolution——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I will have to differ from that statement.

Mr. GEORGE. That the Senator had not read the report?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana had read the report in detail before he introduced this resolution. Since the resolution was introduced, only a few weeks ago, the commission made a supplemental report.

Mr. GEORGE. I mean the full report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I did not read a report before it was made. The second report was offered to the Senate only a few weeks ago. Before I introduced the resolution the commission had presented its first report.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not criticizing the Senator; I am trying to state the facts.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator said I introduced the resolution before I read the report of the commission.

Mr. GEORGE. I repeat it now. The Senator himself, before the Interstate Commerce Committee, stated that he had not read all the report; that at the time of the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee he had had access to only these proof sheets.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator simply is unappreciative of the fact that there were two reports.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I am not unappreciative of the fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The commission made a report on the Norris resolution before my resolution was drawn at all, and I read that report. Only a few weeks ago, after this resolution was introduced, the commission made a further report. I stated before the committee that I had not been able to read the entire report; I had not been able to get it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to emphasize the fact that after the Senator from Montana did read it he called it a monumental report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, no; you are all wrong about that.

Mr. BRUCE. Is not that the fact?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I spoke about the original report, finding that the General Electric Co. was not a power trust.

Mr. BRUCE. But a commission that is good enough to render one monumental report is good enough to render another, and a third one, too.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the argument of the Senator. I commented on the original report of the commission.

Mr. BRUCE. Calling it a monumental report; and if we send this to them, there will be another monumental report, no doubt.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not remember what the language was.

Mr. BRUCE. That was the language of the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I just rose to call attention to the statement of the Senator that I had not even read the report of the commission before I introduced the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. I was not criticizing the Senator in making that statement. I am merely trying to state the facts in this case. What are the facts? On the calendar day of February 9, 1925, the Senate considered the amended resolution introduced by the then sitting Member from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst, accepted an amendment offered at the time or theretofore offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and passed that resolution.

It will be borne in mind that that was early February, 1925. I do not know how long the Federal Trade Commission delayed before it actually took up the work under the resolution, but it took up the work under the resolution, and it has now finally completed the work, at least so far as I am advised.

I asserted, and I assert again, that the Senator from Montana principally relied for his pertinent facts upon the report of the Federal Trade Commission. I am not speaking about newspaper articles, and various complaints from other sources, but for his pertinent facts he relied upon the report of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not accurately state the situation at all. Last spring I made a careful presentation of this whole subject in a speech I delivered to the Senate. I relied for my principal facts upon the facts set out in that speech. We were met then before the committee with the contention that the whole situation was taken care of by the State commissions. In answer to that I read elaborately from the report to which I have referred. In other words, I did not rely upon that except to overcome something that had been said against the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well, Mr. President. It is a rule of law, and the rule is founded upon the soundest morality, that no one can impeach his own witness, that no one can call a witness and then discredit him; and the real reason, and the only reason here offered against referring this matter to the commission, aside from the one suggested by the Senator from Iowa, is that the Federal Trade Commission is unworthy of confidence, or at least that its chairman has such a "bent of mind"—whatever that may be—that no one can expect a fair report in this matter.

Going back to the facts, this is the jury which we selected. I have not heard the Senator from Nebraska say that he has read the report; I am sure he has not read the report. That is no criticism of the Senator from Nebraska nor the Senator from Montana, because the Federal Trade Commission's report was not available to any Senator until last week. Day after day I asked for the final report of the Federal Trade Commission, and I was unable to get it.

I obtained it Saturday afternoon. I remained in my office Sunday and read the report, and now, lest some one may think it is a mere postscript, as the distinguished Senator from Montana would have us believe, to the original report, allow me to say that the original report—that is, part 1 of the report—contains 272 pages and this "postscript" contains about 275 pages. We asked the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation; it made the investigation, and before we read their findings we press for another investigation into the industry. Such a course must create fear and suspicion.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator puts so much faith in the thoroughness and efficiency of this investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission, why does he want to send the matter back to them to be investigated by them again?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator himself called attention to the fact that the commission did not prosecute its inquiry into one matter set out in the Norris resolution. The Senator from Montana has included this particular matter in his resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Federal Trade Commission is thoroughly unworthy and can not be trusted to make this investigation, it could not be trusted to make any, could it?

Mr. GEORGE. It could not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why should it not be abolished?

Mr. GEORGE. I think it should be, if that is true. I do not think there can be argument on the point. If it can not be trusted to make this investigation it can not be trusted to make any investigation and should be abolished.

Let me repeat. Having directed the Federal Trade Commission, an agency of the Government, to make an investigation, and the commission having made the investigation, before reading the report the Senate is asked to pass a resolution which at most merely enlarges upon the main grounds of the original resolution and calls for investigation of one matter which the commission did not consider because of the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, to which I have referred. And the second investigation of the same industry is to be made by a special committee of the Senate, the report of the commission already made remaining in the Senate unread.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I would like to give the exact language of the Senator from Montana before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. He was asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] as to whether he had considered the idea of a joint commission to make the investigation, to which he replied:

> Yes; I did consider the question not with respect to the making up of a special committee of Congress, but whether the Federal Trade Commission should be asked to make this investigation. However, the Federal Trade Commission has made an investigation that will very largely narrow the work that will devolve upon the committee. They were called upon to inquire whether the General Electric Co. was a power trust, a monopoly; whether it monopolized the power interests of the country.

Then he went on to show their work and wound up by saying:

So the report of the Federal Trade Commission gives you the actual situation with respect to the combinations which had been entered into up to that time, and we will take that as a basis and proceed.

But the trouble about that is that the Federal Trade Commission moves very slowly; they go into the minutest details of these things, and it would be probably two or three years before any report could be had. In the second place, I feel, as I said to you a while ago, that publicity is the very best possible cure for many of these evils that creep into industry. We have now two large volumes from the Federal Trade Commission. One that came the other day has not as yet been printed. Nobody knows anything about them, not even a Senator. So that value is entirely gone.

Mr. GEORGE. In view of that statement alone it would seem that a deliberative body could not refuse the amendment offered by me to send this investigation to the commission.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The other day former Senator Lenroot, representing the Power Trust or the combination, appeared before the committee and issued a statement to the effect, as I read it, that they wanted the Federal Trade Commission to have this investigation. Would the Senator tell me why it is the power industry should want the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator yield further? He does know that the Power Trust and all of the allied power companies have been fighting to send this matter to the Federal Trade Commission, does he not?

Mr. GEORGE. Except as disclosed by the record, I do not know. If they ask that it go to the Federal Trade Commission I do not blame them, because I can see how any industry would hesitate to have its affairs gone into by a committee of a body which, having asked for an investigation by a department of the Government, and having gotten it, demands another investigation without first having read the report furnished it.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think the Federal Trade Commission is better equipped and will carry on the investigation better than the Senate of the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not discussing that at this time. I only say that the Federal Trade Commission has made a report which now, for the first time, as an entirety, has become open to our inspection. No one could have read it except some one who was willing to spend the Sabbath in going over the proof sheets.

Mr. WHEELER. The Interstate Commerce Committee had it before them. It was brought before the committee which heard this matter and which reported it out.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; the supplemental report.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. Parts of it at least, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] read into the record excerpts from it.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. As the basis for his inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to say in rebuttal; but it is in the hearings—certain excerpts—and it is pertinent to the question, and it is a ground upon which this second investigation is asked.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; I am not mistaken.

Mr. WHEELER. I am a member of the committee and I stated to the committee repeatedly and the committee understood that my colleague [Senator WALSH] relied for making out his prima facie case on the speech he made in the United States Senate a year ago and which every Member of the Senate was supposed to hear. There was not any question about it at all.

Mr. WATSON. I want to say to my colleague on the committee that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] brought in the proof sheets on the last day of the hearing—not the first day or the second day or any other day, but the last day—and read copious excerpts from them on the last day, and then is when the question came up.

Mr. WHEELER. Not the last day the committee had it before them.

Mr. WATSON. The last day of the hearings.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I had opened the case for the committee, and after everybody had been heard in opposition I then brought in the report which I had just received.

Mr. WATSON. But the committee did not have access to the report, because he brought it in the last day, and I called his office the next day to ask if I could get a copy of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I presented to the committee what I had.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly; but there was just that one copy accessible and available to members. The Senator himself said:

We have now two large volumes from the Federal Trade Commission. One that came the other day has not as yet been printed. Nobody knows anything about them, even a Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. That was the last day of the hearing, but I submit that after the hearing the committee held conferences and each member of the committee had those reports and were supposed to have them before they passed on the question, and the Interstate Commerce Committee, after having these hearings, reported out the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. My friend knows, as a matter of fact, that no member of the committee did have those reports. The Senator himself did not have one.

Mr. WHEELER. We had copies that my colleague [Mr. WALSH of Montana] brought there.

Mr. WATSON. I had one, but I do not think anybody else got one.

Mr. WHEELER. It is simply ridiculous for Senators to say that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the committee understood that he was basing it upon that hearing at all, because of the fact that the committee knows, and every member that was there at any time knows, that I repeatedly stated to them that he was basing it upon the speech he made on this question in the Senate of the United States about a year ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I should like to say that I was out of the Chamber for a moment when the Senator from Indiana read from the record what I said before the committee. I am not sure how much he read, but the context ought to be borne in mind.

I was arguing before the committee that an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission would be conducted practically in secret, the public would know nothing whatever about the evidence produced before the commission from time to time, and that even when it finally made a report, that report would go on file and nobody would know anything about it. So I adverted to the fact that it had already made a voluminous report with which no one seemed to have any familiarity at all, and I urged that as a reason why the investigation should be conducted by the Senate committee, so that the public would know all about the matter as evidence was adduced from time to time.

Mr. WATSON. I read everything the Senator said, including all that. I called particular attention to this language:

So the report of the Federal Trade Commission gives you the actual situation with respect to the combinations which had been entered into up to that time, and we will take that as a basis and proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. I did not propose to travel over the ground they had traveled over.

Now I desire to say—and I shall be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Georgia—that he scarcely represents the situation, as I think, when he says that the Federal Trade Commission has made an examination and inquiry into this matter and that now we want another inquiry before we have even read the report. That contemplates that the resolution covers the same ground as the resolution under which the Federal Trade Commission acted. The Senator surely knows he is mistaken?

Mr. GEORGE. It does substantially cover the same ground. It may call for some additional information, but it does substantially cover the same ground, and I do not think the Senator from Montana will deny it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do absolutely deny that it does. I deny that it has anything at all to do with the question of violations of the antitrust act. There is not a thing in the resolution that the Senator can point to that will indicate that.

Moreover, while I am talking about this matter, the rider on the appropriation bill is practically nothing more nor less than a provision of the original enabling act creating the Federal upon the direction of the President or of either House of Congress shall investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

Trade Commission, which provides that the Federal Trade Commission—

That is its grant of power. It has no power under the law to make this investigation. Even under the original act it has no power to make the investigation.

Mr. GEORGE. I propose to discuss that to-morrow. If there is no combination here in restraint of trade, if there is no trust here, what does the Senator propose to investigate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not follow that there is any investigation at all——

Mr. GEORGE. No; I mean this: If there is no monopoly, if there is no monopolistic tendency in this industry, does the Senator want an investigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is not the question here at all. Here is a corporation that is not a trust at all. It owns absolutely nothing except one plant in one State and another plant in another State, and it transports——

Mr. GEORGE. Why does the Senator want to investigate such a corporation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. It transports electrical energy from one State to the other. It is not a trust at all. We are not investigating the trust character of it. That has already been investigated by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; and so has the holding company been investigated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the holding company has been investigated, but the financing of the holding company has not been investigated.

Mr. GEORGE. Does that follow at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It has not been investigated at all.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is mistaken. Perhaps not as completely as it will be if this additional investigation is authorized, but it has been investigated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The financing can be gone into so far as it is material. That was the question left to the Federal Trade Commission on a prior occasion, and the only question that could be left to them under their grant of power.

Mr. GEORGE. I propose to discuss the matter to-morrow. I propose to discuss the merits of the Federal Trade Commission's report. But I am contenting myself to-night with the statement, if I may be allowed to repeat, that the Senate, having asked for an investigation, having selected the forum, did not wait for the report of its tribunal but instituted another investigation into the very same industries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if it did not cover the same ground why did it wait?

Mr. GEORGE. It did cover the same ground, as I think.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let the Senator compare the Norris resolution with this resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. I will compare it to-morrow. I stated that I did not intend going into that matter this afternoon, and I do not want to quibble over mere verbal statements. The Senator is after the same industry; his resolution affects the same organizations; he aims at but one thing.

The Senator from Nebraska, who introduced the other resolution, has not read the report of the Federal Trade Commission. Its report speaks for itself. This is not a partial report on behalf of the utilities; at points it is very critical of the companies. Indeed, the whole tendency of the report is to emphasize the necessity for Federal legislation. If the investigation now proposed has not that as its object, it is idle.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disputing and I am not going to dispute the value of the report of the Federal Trade Commission. I expect, as soon as I can get it and find the time to read it carefully, and I shall obtain, no doubt, a great deal of information from it. I have read extracts from it, or what I suppose are extracts from it, and I think there is a great deal about it to be commended. As I understand, the commission probably made a very good investigation of the question covered by the particular part of the resolution introduced by me which they did investigate, but they did not investigate all of it. To my mind, the important feature that would have shown great necessity for legislation has not been touched by the Federal Trade Commission. That is the particular feature that this resolution does take up, as I understand—and, as the Senator from Montana has said, his resolution is a copy in part of the resolution which I introduced—which was held by the Attorney General to be beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to refer to that briefly. I am not going to detain the Senate much longer this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Georgia will not, I am sure, try to claim that those who are in favor of the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Montana are necessarily condemning the Federal Trade Commission or even criticizing it?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] most severely criticized the Federal Trade Commission. Not only that, but he most severely criticized the other House of Congress. Not only that, but he has most severely criticized the utilities commissions of every State in the Union.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand him in that way.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Nebraska may read the remarks of the Senator from Montana to-morrow and he will find that no more scathing criticism could be made.

Mr. NORRIS. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Montana to-day.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not mean denunciation; I mean criticism. Indeed, the Senator has put the whole case for his motion here as opposed to the amendment which I offered, upon the ground that we can not trust the Federal Trade Commission; upon the ground that even the other House can not be trusted to appropriate a small sum of money to cover an investigation actually made at the request of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Georgia goes too far in his criticism of the Senator from Montana. However, we can not get anywhere by quibbling over a thing of that kind. Take, for instance, my own idea of Mr. Humphrey, who for a good while, I think, dominated the commission. I opposed him when he was nominated by the President to go on the commission as bitterly and as strongly as I knew how to oppose anybody, but I never once charged him with being dishonest; I did not make any statement one way or the other on the question, but it seemed to me that he was a dangerous man for that position because of his viewpoint, with which I became familiar from my service with him in the House of Representatives.

I think I know him. He is a wonderfully courageous man, and is entitled to much credit for his courage. He stands up for what he believes to be the right, and I have no doubt that he believes in the things that he advocates; but for that reason, if I am right, those very beliefs make him unfit to occupy the position he is now occupying. The more able he may be, the more dangerous he can become when occupying that kind of position.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] put his objection solely on that ground, we will let it rest there. I do not want to do him any injustice, of course, and I do not want to impute any statement to him that he did not make, but I did understand——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt my colleague?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to ask my colleague if he does not distinguish between criticism and reflection? A man who is not honest would not have any influence with his colleagues upon a commission such as the Federal Trade Commission. The more honest, however, a man is the more dangerous he is in such a position if his views are what we believe to be dangerous.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, with all due respect, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] makes this commissioner a very able man, and my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] makes him a very honest man; so it seems as though he is a fairly good man to make the investigation.

I do not wish to impute any statement to the Senator from Montana that he did not make or that he did not intend to make. I do know, however, what his objection to my amendment is; he is wholly unwilling to have the proposed investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission because he does not think that they will make the investigation, believing that they are lacking in power with respect to one feature of it, and, as I believe he finally said, as to all features of the resolution. He does not desire the investigation to be made by the Federal Trade Commission because he does not believe the commission can or will make a fair report on the subjects involved. I am discussing it, therefore, and must be understood as discussing it, merely in the light of that statement. The Senator does not think that we can get a fair report from the Federal Trade Commission. I am trying to say that that commission has made its report, and I am trying to say that the Senate is now proposing to go on with another investigation, let us say a partial or supplemental one or one to follow up the investigation already made without having read the report following the investigation which has already been made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber and have not had the advantage of all the remarks of the Senator from Montana and but a few sentences of the statement made by the Senator from Georgia. I have deduced, though, from what has been said—and I have an open mind upon this question, let me say—that pursuant to a resolution of the Senate, a report has been submitted by the Federal Trade Commission which has gone somewhat into this important subject. That report criticizes some of the utilities and submits information which may be the basis or may not be the basis for legislation. If the commission had authority to conduct the investigation covered by its report, I have not yet learned why it has not the authority to continue the investigation or to make further investigation in conformity with the resolution which is now before the Senate. If the Senator has not touched upon that question, I shall be very glad to hear him do so.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that it has the power; and that question I wish to discuss to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, would the Senator like to complete his remarks to-morrow?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like very much to do so.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 14, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, February 13, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, maker of heaven and earth and Father of all mercies, we thank Thee that the genius of our Republic contemplates the high privilege for every citizen to worship God according to the voice of his own conscience. It also secures to each the right to enjoy the fruits of his own labors. Forbid, O Lord, that we should pass by these blessings unnoticed. May they fall even upon the hearts of the reluctant and stupid and summon them to a more grateful life. We pause at one of the most radiant pages in our Nation's biography. In Thy name we bless his sacred memory. No son of the Republic has ever passed from a cradle so humble to a grave so illustrious. We praise Thee that antagonisms and enmities are no more and that every section of Columbia is joined in a national anthem of self-respect, reverence, and brotherhood. As long as the human heart remains to revere truth, fidelity, and goodness may we seek to make for our united country an everlasting name in heaven and earth. May it grow more stately and shine more brilliantly on the shore line of time, fulfilling the genius and mission of a great, free, united people. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 10, 1928, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 7916. An act authorizing the Madison Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Madison, Jefferson County, Ind.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Menominee River at or near Marinette, Wis.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2656. An act to establish a minimum area for a Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 11, 1928, they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 473. An act authorizing the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.

H. R. 7013. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928.

H. R. 7902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.

H. R. 8269. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to preside to-morrow.

THE LATE HON. STEPHEN MORGAN, OF OHIO

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise to announce to the House the death of a former Member of this House, Hon. Stephen Morgan. Mr. Morgan died at his home in Columbus on last Thursday. He represented in this House the same district that I now have the honor to represent. He was elected to and served in the Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, and Fifty-eighth Congresses. Mr. Morgan was a man who left a great impress upon the people of his district. He had been a teacher for many years and in that capacity had been the head of a normal school at Oak Hill, Ohio, which a great many young men and women attended. This school was known as the Morgan Academy. Many of the leading men and women in that section owe their start in life to the inspiration gained at this academy. Since leaving Congress Mr. Morgan kept abreast of the times, and few men were better posted on the questions that involved the welfare of our people or our country. He was a man of great mental acumen. He lived on a very high plane. His death is mourned by all who knew him. He was a man of high character and most exemplary conduct. I knew him intimately and I feel it is an honor for me to stand here and give this brief testimonial to the worth of this distinguished citizen of my home county and district.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I would suggest that the gentleman from Ohio communicate Mr. Morgan's death to the Moses committee that is now compiling the new directory. They are just about ready to go to print and they have asked me on various occasions to furnish the names and dates of death of ex-Members. I shall be glad if the gentleman will do that.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his suggestion, and I shall most gladly follow it out.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I wish to add in addition to the excellent remarks of my colleague [Mr. JENKINS] a tribute to the memory of Stephen Morgan. He was a faithful friend, an upright and conscientious citizen, loyal in the performance of all his duties, a man upon whose public or private life there never was a stain.

His early activities, as has already been stated, began as a teacher in a common school, a lowly but noble vocation, in which many thousands have been engaged with a permanence and a devotion not surpassed by those upon whom sacred hands have been placed. Then for some 15 years he was the principal of an academy or normal school, and it was by reason of the acquaintances gained in this position that he was nominated for Congress.

I remember him well in his service of six years, from 1899 to 1905. I do not recall a single speech he made here, but he was constant in attendance and faithful in his committee work, with a keen discernment of the ability and trustworthiness of his colleagues. In his public life he observed the injunction, "Study to be quiet," and he was an illustration of the fact that there are many in legislative bodies who profit more as listeners than as talkers.

It is a source of great regret to me that he has passed on. I have a new realization that while we approach the twilight hour we may have troops of friends, nevertheless there is a greater multitude among those who have passed through the golden gate into the great beyond.

Stephen Morgan may not have had widespread publicity, but his work was well done. His body will be buried at Horeb, in old Jackson County, which he loved so well, among the hills, not far from the Ohio River. Children and grandchildren of those whom he taught and with whom he associated will as the years pass on cherish his memory and profit by his example.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have to-day introduced a bill for the amendment of section 6 of the Sherman Antitrust Act relating to the seizure of property used to aid violations of the act in order to aid the Department of Justice, which is now prosecuting an investigation of the operations of Anderson-Clayton & Co., of Houston, Tex., Anderson, Clayton & Fleming of New York, Pennefather & Co., of Liverpool, England, and other firms and corporations confederated with them charged with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act, which produced the condition of demoralization of the cotton industry, to which I called the attention of the House in my remarks on February 8, in connection with which I pointed out the fact that approximately 200,000 bales of cotton had been concentrated in New York for the purpose of manipulating and depressing the price of cotton to the great detriment of the cotton growers and others legitimately engaged in the cotton industry.

The presence of this cotton in New York is the basis of one of the items of manipulation complained of before the Department of Justice, and it is to assist that department I am asking for this amendment of the Sherman Antitrust Act in order to permit the department, when its present investigation reaches the point where it concludes that the Sherman Antitrust Act has been violated, as in my opinion it must, it may seize in the name of the Government this cotton, the presence of which has materially contributed to pillaging the South and the cotton industry generally of hundreds of millions of dollars within the last 15 or 16 months.

As the act appears at present, it provides for the forfeiture of such property only when it is in transit, but this cotton is now stored in warehouses in New York, where it is used for this unlawful purpose, and this amendment will unquestionably permit its seizure.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to a most brazen boast made by Mr. W. L. Clayton, of Anderson, Clayton & Co., which with its associates constitutes the most powerful cotton organization in the world, and the leader in this alleged conspiracy wherein he is quoted as having said in an address that, "firms other than his own can not hope to avoid loss in the cotton business unless they can correctly guess his mind."

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the tragedy of the situation is that that statement is true and is the cause of the deplorable condition in which the cotton industry find itself to-day, as a result of the unlawful manipulations of the cotton market on the part of these conspirators whom the Department of Justice is now attempting to reach through the strong arm of the law.

I congratulate the Department of Justice on its efforts, and I want them to know that the Congress of the United States is squarely behind them in this movement.

I want to assure them that they will have the backing of Congress in bringing to justice these men who are brazenly destroying the price of America's greatest commodity.

Before closing, I want to read one quotation from a speech made by a former president of the New York Cotton Exchange, who, in speaking of Mr. Clayton's boast, said:

> It is no concern of ours to further the grandiose plans of a would-be Napoleon of cotton—

Referring to W. L. Clayton—

> On the contrary, both our interest and our duty lie in the use of all our energies, all the means at our disposal, to bring it about that never again can one man stand before us and assure us with the smile of conscious power that nobody can buy or sell a bale of cotton except at a loss unless he can guess that man's mind.

Has it come to the point in this country when, by such manipulation as this, one man can so control the cotton market as to stand brazenly and defiantly announce to the world that no man can safely invest in a bale of cotton unless he can successfully guess that man's mind!

The efforts I made a few days ago are bearing fruit. I have in my hand now a resolution passed by the New York Cotton Exchange starting out with a reference to the resolution passed by the Mississippi Legislature, in which they not only welcome an investigation but they assure us they will give us their help in bringing about a cleaning up of this unfortunate condition that is to-day demoralizing the cotton industry and driving our farmers into poverty and our cotton people—the people legitimately engaged in the cotton industry—into bankruptcy, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I understand the gentleman has introduced a resolution asking for an investigation?

Mr. RANKIN. I am speaking now on this amendment, the immediate passage of which is an imperative necessity.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I know that; but has not the gentleman introduced a resolution asking for an investigation of the New York Exchange?

Mr. RANKIN. There has been a resolution, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, introduced in both the House and the Senate.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Before what committee is that resolution pending?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I wish to say that I will be pleased to join my friend in an effort to get action on that resolution. I think the investigation should be made.

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly; and I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that I was preparing my resolution and waiting for a copy of the resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi. I hope to have my resolution on that proposition in the hopper within the next day or two, but action on this amendment I am offering to the Sherman antitrust law should not wait upon any investigation. Let it go to a committee and be reported out at once and give the Department of Justice the law-enforcing power of this Government—the power to confiscate this cotton, as was contemplated by the framers of that law when it was passed.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. Senator MAYFIELD, of Texas, before Christmas, introduced a resolution to investigate the Department of Agriculture and the activities of the New York Exchange. Since the holidays Senator SMITH, of South Carolina, has introduced a resolution for this purpose, and I have introduced one in the House for the same purpose. These resolutions are pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the Senate and the Committee on Agriculture in the House, but we are not getting anywhere with them.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What I am anxious to do is to get action not only on that resolution but favorable action on the bill introduced to-day by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] so we will get some results.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. You will never do that until the Representatives and the Senators from the cotton-growing States and those in sympathy with us demand it, which I have been constantly contending for, for some time.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Georgia and to the gentleman from Texas that never before have the men representing the cotton States had such an opportunity as they have now, with the Department of Justice conducting an investigation for the purpose of prosecuting those engaged in violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. With the moral support of Congress, and especially by the passage of this amendment, we can absolutely break up and forever put a stop to the concentration of these great amounts of cotton for the purpose of manipulating prices to the injury of everybody but the manipulators.

I believe the Department of Justice has this right under the present law without this amendment, but in order to make "assurance double sure" I have introduced this amendment. When it goes to the appropriate committee I shall appear before them and ask that they report it out at once in order that we may pass it through the House and Senate and bring about a cleaning up of what, in my opinion, is the most iniquitous situation the cotton industry ever faced. [Applause.]

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM DALLAS BYNUM, OF INDIANA

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes to pay a tribute to a former Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, William Dallas Bynum, a former Member of this House, died in Indianapolis on October 21 last, at the home of his son. Death was caused by acute myocarditis. He was 81 years old. Mr. Bynum was born in Newberry, Green County, Ind., June 26, 1846, where his parents had settled in 1818. Completing his common and high school education in the schools of Greene County, Mr. Bynum entered Indiana University in 1865, and was graduated in 1869. Following graduation, Mr. Bynum read law in a Terre Haute law office, and was admitted to the bar in 1872, beginning his practice of law in Washington, Ind. The Indianapolis News gave a brief account of his political career:

Beginning a career of politics, Mr. Bynum served successively as the town's first city clerk and second mayor of the city of Washington, Ind. Coming to Indianapolis in 1881 Mr. Bynum was elected to the State legislature, serving two terms, the latter as speaker of the house. In 1885 he was elected Democratic Representative in the Congress from the seventh district, Indiana, and remained in Washington for the next 10 years, becoming "whip" of the minority party in the lower House.

In the Fifty-second Congress Mr. Bynum was a candidate for Speaker, the honor, however, going to Representative Crisp, of Georgia.

President William McKinley, in 1897, appointed Bynum member of a special commission to codify and revise the laws of the United States and he was occupied on this mission until 1906. Since 1916 he had served as a member of the board of trustees of the Indiana School for the Blind. His term on the board would have expired in 1931.

Memorial services in honor of Mr. Bynum were held by the Indianapolis Bar Association, and the Indianapolis News of October 22 paid him editorial tribute in the following manner:

Men sometimes seem to become almost historic figures before their death, and it was so with William D. Bynum who died yesterday at the age of 81. The days of his active service, and of the fame that it brought him, had long passed, and there were probably many youngsters who had never heard of him. Yet Mr. Bynum was one of the ablest and most useful Members of Congress that have represented this district, his term of service covering a period of 10 years. It began with the first administration of Grover Cleveland and ended with the Bryan control of the party * * *.

Following the leadership of the Democratic President, Mr. Bynum opposed free silver, broke with the party, and became one of the leaders of the gold Democratic movement, which took form in a convention held in this city in 1896, and in the nomination of the Palmer and Buckner ticket. * * *

In the campaign that followed Mr. Bynum was a leading figure.

As Member of Congress Mr. Bynum served with credit and distinction. He was an authority on the money question and was informed on the tariff, of which he had been a student for years. A man of strong personality, unquestioned courage, and rare independence of character (as his bolt in 1896 demonstrated) he was, both morally and intellectually thoroughly equipped for public service. Mr. Bynum's colleagues in Congress recognized his ability and esteemed and valued him.

A Cleveland Democrat, Mr. Bynum took the Cleveland view of public questions, not as a mere follower, but as the holder of the same principles and ideals. In whatever capacity he served, he did his duty as he saw it, and apparently had not other ambition than to do his duty. He always had the courage of his convictions, and he believed that principles were things to be adhered to, and, as far as possible, realized in action. A rather unusual type of public servant was Mr. Bynum.

Mr. Bynum is survived by the widow, one son, and one daughter. Burial was made at Washington, Ind.

He served his country well in his day and generation.

He loved his country because it was his own
And scorned to give aught other reason why.

His life is a testimonial of courage, patriotism, and service to his fellow man. The youth of our land might well receive from his life the admonition given by Wolsey to his friend Cromwell:

Let all the ends thou aimst at be
Thy country's, thy God's, and truth's.
Be noble and the nobleness that Lies in other men, sleeping but Never dead, will rise in majesty
To meet thine own.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The question was taken.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on account of the absence of a quorum and make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 322, not voting, 111, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Before announcing the result of the vote the Chair would like to state that he has requested five minutes of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in order that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] may now read Lincoln's Gettysburg address before we begin consideration of the bill. Immediately after the reading the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will discuss and explain the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. It will be a little more comprehensive than that, Mr. Speaker, for I am going to talk about the finances of the Government as they now exist and call attention to the obligations we are about to create.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10625) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] to read Lincoln's Gettysburg address.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, yesterday was the anniversary of Abraham Lincoln. On November 19, 1863, on the occasion of the dedication of the Gettysburg battle field as a national cemetery President Lincoln said:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place of those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the House I will take occasion to discuss the general financial situation of the Government as it now exists. As a preface, I want to say a word about the duties and responsibilities of the Committee on Appropriations, so far as the chairman is concerned.

It is not a sinecure to be placed in a position where your duty and responsibility demands that you say "no" in many cases where you might, under the circumstances, like to say "yes." I find myself unpopular at times because I am frank to express my opinion on the cost of various measures and my opposition to them on account of the cost. I conceive it to be my duty to be frank, courageous, and combative when increased cost of the Government is concerned, particularly in cases where the full facts do not seem to justify it. If I did not act in this manner, I have the feeling that the House would judge me unfit for my position, and for that reason I am willing to incur whatever criticism I may inherit by what I believe to be a conscientious discharge of duty. [Applause.]

The Committee on Appropriations has endeavored to bring to the House, in connection with its bills, a clear, businesslike statement of the facts involved. If the House does not agree and takes some other action, that is the decision of the body whose servant the committee is. There can be no quarrel over reversals, for the final decision and responsibility belong to the House.

Ever since I have been chairman of the committee it has been my aim, so far as consistent with good management of the Government, to keep the sum total appropriated each session within the limit of the aggregate of the Budget estimates submitted by the Executive as necessary for the operation of the Government and the payment of its obligations. Up to the present there has not been a year in which the total of appropriations granted by the Congress has not been less than the total requested by the President. In fact, Congress has, in the aggregate, since the Budget came into operation, made appropriations approximately $350,000,000 less than the Budget estimates. [Applause.] That is a very commendable record, but I am sorry to say that a continuance of it at this session is dubious. [Laughter.] The action of the House on the recent War Department appropriation bill has placed the situation on all the bills where they are in excess of the Budget estimates at the present status. It is my hope that ultimately the Congress may come out in the aggregate under the total of the Budget, but, frankly, the outlook is dark. If Congress exceeds the Budget recommendations of the Executive in the aggregate, the responsibility is ours to meet and defend the action which brings about that variance in total. Such an eventuality is one of the vital principals of a budget system—that each branch of the Government—legislative and executive—should take a clear position in matters of taxation and expenditures and be prepared to justify that position if the occasion arises.

Congress is confronted at this session with two difficult problems—the one of reducing taxation, and the other of coping with new proposal for increased expenditures, which in some cases demand urgent and final settlement at this session. The President in his message recommended a tax reduction not to exceed $225,000,000. He also presented a budget calling for a maximum of expenditure which would at the same time permit this tax reduction to be made. The House at this session, in dealing with the tax-reduction problem, has passed a bill cutting taxes approximately $290,000,000, and thereby eliminated $65,000,000 more of revenue than the Executive has said might safely be taken and still leave enough to finance the Budget. Now the question that arises in my mind is very practical. How close are we getting to a balance between receipts and expenditures when we decrease the revenue beyond the safety point and at the same time add liberally to the expenditures? The two actions are not in harmony, and instead of closing the gap it is further widened by driving a wedge in from both sides—one by further decreasing the revenue, and the other by further increasing the expenditures.

On the basis of present estimates, which may be varied one way or the other when the first installment of taxes is paid on March 15 next, our estimated receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1929 are as follows:

Estimated receipts	$3,809,497,314
Estimated expenditures	3,556,957,031
Estimated surplus	252,540,283

It is from this estimated surplus that a tax reduction, not to exceed $225,000,000, was recommended.

In the estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year no special allowance was made for starting some problems which are now before Congress. They include the following major items of expenditure legislation:

(1) Alien property bill, $100,000,000.

(2) Purchase of property in the triangle area in Washington, $25,000,000.

(3) Additional expenditures under the bill to raise the authorization of public-building projects from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000—$100,000,000.

(4) Expansion of the naval-building program, $1,000,000,000 or more.

(5) Flood-relief legislation, $300,000,000 plus.

(6) Boulder Dam, perhaps more than $125,000,000.

(7) Muscle Shoals, $67,000,000.

(8) Farm relief, indefinite.

(9) Miscellaneous legislation, from $25,000,000 up.

I assume that in a budget of expenditures, nearly $4,000,000,000 annually, there is considerable give and take. There will be failures to spend and savings in some of the appropriations which are estimated to be expended because of conditions arising to prevent it, and, conversely, there will be some unforeseen expenditures arising to take their places. There may be an increase or a decrease in the estimated revenue which would affect the case one way or the other. However, the whole situation is on an estimated basis and nothing positive can be known until the year is actually under way. We should, however, have the best estimates obtainable in advance. Better figures on which to base revenue estimates for 1929 will be available when tax payments are made in March. It is the judgment of the Treasury Department, however, that such returns instead of showing that the estimate of revenue for 1929 is not high enough will actually indicate that it is too high. A comparison of the revenues of this fiscal year to date with the revenues of last fiscal year for the same period shows a falling off of approximately $65,000,000. This seems to justify the belief that the revenues estimated for 1929 are not to be considered as too low and that we will be fortunate if we succeed in obtaining the amount at present estimated to be received in 1929.

Now in the margin of tax reduction suggested by the President and the Treasury Department I assume there was some leeway which might care for the increased expenditures which Congress within reason would adopt at this session as adding to the burdens of the next fiscal year, but with a $65,000,000 increase in the tax cut that margin is wiped out and inroads have been made upon any leeway which might exist by reason of the original estimated revenue proving to be too low.

I am calling this matter to the attention of the House, not to be critical but in a spirit of helpfulness and as a guide for our action in the consideration of appropriation bills and in the enactment of legislation which has the effect of adding to expenditures which have not been specifically included within the estimated revenues. I voted against the tax bill because I believed it went beyond the bounds of safety. I shall oppose those increased-expenditure proposals, which I believe to be unjustifiable and place in jeopardy a balancing of our receipts and expenditures. That at least will permit me to be consistent.

Now there is no particular reason why I should be more exercised about this than any other Member of the House, except that the House has placed me in a position of trust and I assume that it wants me to present the pertinent facts.

It further becomes my duty as chairman of the Appropriations Committee to give a résumé of our appropriation record of the session when it closes and to state what has been accomplished. I have been proud of that record in the past. It has been one which Members could stand on with great pride and cite as genuine accomplishment. I am thinking now about what the record of this session is to be like. I know what it ought to be, and I hope when it is written that it will be as creditable as previous accomplishments.

There is only one way in which we can attain a satisfactory record, and that is by a careful scrutiny of our legislation and a reduction to the very minimum in new proposals and a sound and reasonable action upon them.

It seems to me that this is the stage of the session to pause and give attention to what is involved in many of these great measures that are pending. The extent to which we consider the taxpayer as well as the beneficiaries of the proposed legislation is going to be the determining factor in the soundness of our action.

Now I want to devote a little time to this bill. The amount which is recommended to be appropriated is $1,063,337,060.

This sum is divided between the Treasury and Post Office Department as follows:

Treasury Department	$298,387,018
Post Office Department	764,950,042

The bill represents a decrease under the Budget estimates of $6,223,200.

The Treasury Department is supported out of two classes of appropriations—the regular annual and the permanent. In the permanent appropriations there is a net reduction of $52,000,000. Involved in this is a reduction in the amount of interest payments on the public debt from $720,000,000 for the fiscal year to $670,000,000 for the next fiscal year—a decrease of $50,000,000. This is a wonderful showing and is due to the excellent management of our finances. The cut in the interest cost results from two causes: (1) The decrease in the public debt through the operation of the sinking fund and the use of foreign repayments and the surplus in receipts; and (2) a decrease in the annual interest rate on securities through refunding operations. The refunding of the second Liberty loan at lower rates of interest on the securities issued to replace those retired as a part of the refunding operation, represents a decrease in interest alone of $21,000,000. The average rate of interest on the outstanding interest-bearing debt of the United States on December 31, 1927, was 3.88 per cent, compared with an average interest rate of 4.29 per cent in 1921. This decrease in the average interest rate represents an annual saving of approximately $72,500,000 which is due to the successful financial management of the administration in carrying on these refunding operations and obtaining money at lower rates of interest, and this is in turn due to the healthful financial condition of the country induced very largely by the successive reductions in taxation which have taken place and the economical conduct of the fiscal affairs of the Government.

The bill recommends for regular annual appropriation for the Treasury Department a total of $298,387,018, which is $1,629,962.44 more than the comparable appropriations made and available for like purposes during the fiscal year 1928, and $3,123,200 less than the Budget recommendations.

While I am not going to touch on all of the details here, I do commend a careful reading of the report of the committee on this bill, because it is comprehensive. It will inform you and it will enable you to inform people all over the country about these two big departments.

There is an aggregate reduction of more than $1,000,000 in the appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Public Debt Service. Under the authority granted him by law, the Secretary of the Treasury has ordered a reduction in the size of the paper currency of the United States. Work is progressing on that program and it is hoped the change will take place some time during the next fiscal year, the date depending upon a determination of the question of whether to put all denominations of the new size into circulation at once or to put the $1 bills out first and have them followed later by the larger denominations. The matter has been gone into very thoroughly by the Treasury Department, and the committee has reviewed the plans. It is believed that the new currency will be more convenient and satisfactory to the public from the standpoint of convenience in handling, will be more durable, and certainly will be more economical to produce, and can be manufactured in larger quantities in a shorter period of time than the present size.

In connection with the Customs Service the committee has made one important change. The estimates called, among other items, for an increase of $191,944 for salary adjustments in the field positions. The committee has recommended an increase of $240,000 over the Budget in this instance, bringing the total up to $430,000. This sum, according to the officials of the Treasury Department, will be sufficient to provide an advance of one step in the salary rating of every employee whose services are such as to deserve this recognition. The action is recommended to the House as being just. Congress has been quite generous with the Customs Service in the past in the matter of salary adjustments. The average salary for the whole service has been raised since 1923 from $1,700 to more than $2,000 for 1928, and by the terms of this bill it will be further raised to in the neighborhood of $2,100, and that is sufficient.

It has been frequently said that the men in the Customs Service are living on starvation wages, that they are unjustly treated, and are getting less than $1,500 a year on the average. The facts disclose that the average of all salaries in the service is about $2,000. So do not pay attention to everything that you hear from everybody. Take the facts themselves and decide the question.

In the Bureau of Internal Revenue, aside from the transfer of funds to the Bureau of Prohibition on account of the act making the Prohibition Unit a separate bureau, there is a straight-out decrease of $476,860, of which $161,860 is due to reductions in force recommended in the Budget and a decrease of $315,000 under the current law and the Budget estimate recommended by the committee. This seems to be safe. The work of the bureau is decreasing, due to the bringing current of the auditing of cases for previous years, and while there are some temporary situations which need improvement, the committee feels that they may be met and the work of collecting the internal revenue satisfactorily provided for with the amount allowed.

The bill carries $132,000,000 for the refunding of internal-revenue taxes illegally collected. This appropriation appears again in the annual bill for the first time in many years. It has heretofore been carried in deficiency bills on a calendar-year basis. The amount recommended, compared with the like amount made available for the current year, shows a decrease of $18,000,000. This decrease comes from the disposition of the back cases and a lessening of the amount that needs to be refunded. While this is a gain to the Government, it has an offsetting disadvantage because the disposal of the back cases also means that less revenue will be collected from schedules that were underpaid in the past. The Government has been collecting large amounts from these back taxes. The peak was reached in the fiscal year 1923, when it touched $600,000,000. For this year it is estimated at from $260,000,000 to $280,000,000, and for the next year it will further decrease. A very interesting statement will be found in the report on the bill, showing that all together we have paid out in refunds approximately $827,000,000, while we have collected from back taxes in the same period over $3,600,000,000, a ratio of $4.25 collected from underpaid schedules to $1 returned on account of overpaid schedules.

The Bureau of Prohibition appears in this bill as a separate organization, due to the act passed at the last session. Eliminating transfers of funds due to the establishment of this separate bureau, there is a straight-out decrease in the appropriation for the next year of $350,000. This cut is recommended by the Commissioner of Prohibition, who states that it will be possible to conduct the service with the smaller amount, due to better organization and closer administration. Prohibition enforcement is not perfect; perhaps it is not what it should be; but I believe that the new bureau is frankly and sincerely endeavoring to carry out the law which it is charged with enforcing. The civil-service situation in the bureau is embarrassing and demoralizing, and I hope that a way will soon be found to straighten it out and enable the service to go ahead with the enforcement work unhandicapped by the uncertainties which now make the task more difficult.

Mr. Doran, the present commissioner, has been coming before us ever since prohibition began. He has been before us as a subordinate, but we noticed that as a subordinate he had the facts. He has now been honored with the position of Commissioner of Prohibition. If prohibition can not be enforced by a man like Mr. Doran, then it can not be enforced by anybody, because Mr. Doran believes in it and understands it. In saying this I have no desire to reflect on any of his predecessors. They were all good men, but none of them seemed to approach the situation as he approaches it.

The Coast Guard is enlarged by 8 officers, 15 warrant officers, and 408 enlisted men. This augmentation is largely accounted for by the commissioning of three new vessels which have been authorized by Congress. One of these boats will go into the Gulf of Mexico and two to the Pacific coast, where the commandant believes that the forces should be strengthened. The new vessels are a part of the fleet of 10 authorized in 1925. While additional personnel is granted for these boats without the decommissioning of old vessels now in the service, the committee has the understanding that as the remaining 7 of the 10 boats are commissioned there will be a retirement of older and unfit vessels, and in that way the personnel will be found for the new boats without increasing the total personnel. The Coast Guard is doing excellent work both in the sphere of prevention of smuggling and law enforcement and in the saving of life and property at sea.

Congress has been generous with it in the matter of providing funds and equipment for its duties, but it is a navy in itself now, with a total personnel of 13,000 for the next fiscal year and with 37 cruising cutters, 414 lesser vessels, 25 destroyers, over 250 life-saving stations, and 5 seaplanes. There should, with this organization, be ample forces and equipment to perform the duties satisfactorily with a very minimum of increase for some years. In preparing the bill the committee has eliminated $32,200 for keeping in service a vessel more than 50 years old, which has been supplanted by a new and modern boat. There seems to be no sound reason why this boat should continue to be operated, and the funds have been taken out.

In this connection I might say of every branch of the Government, that once they get their nose under the tent they commence to swallow the tent. The Coast Guard has been no exception to the rule. There are many fine men in every branch of the service, but they are all forgetful, sometimes, every one of them, that there is anybody else involved except them. The taxpayer is often not given any consideration except by chance. I contend that the House of Representatives, through its agencies, is the only place in the Government where the taxpayer has his full consideration. Help us to give the taxpayer all the chance which you can. See to it that he is not overburdened with too many loads that somebody else should carry. Let us try to give him an understanding that we are here thinking about the man who digs the coal in the coal mine, or the man who runs the train at night, or the man who puts in the sewers that give us the sanitation that we enjoy. Let us understand, if we can, his problem and lighten the load on him as much as possible. [Applause.]

There is an important increase under the Public Health Service. An amount of $230,000 is recommended for rural sanitation, which is $145,000 over the current year. This sum is for rural health work in the counties of the flooded area of the South. After the water receded from the disastrous floods of the Mississippi River the Red Cross, the States and counties, and the Public Health Service raised a total of $955,000 for this county work, of which the Public Health Service contributed $262,000 this current year from the epidemic fund. For the next fiscal year the work has been transferred from the epidemic fund to the rural sanitation fund. The amount of $262,000 for the current year has been expended on work in 101 counties in the flooded district, where the organization is now perfected, or funds are in hand for perfecting it, in 86 counties, leaving 15 counties. The $230,000 recommended for the next year will permit the normal work of rural sanitation to proceed under the customary amount of $85,000, and the additional $145,000 is predicated upon a continuance for the first six months of the new fiscal year, or as much longer as it can be carried with this amount of this special work in the flooded counties.

Nothing has been left undone to see that those who suffered as a result of the great flood were made as comfortable as possible, and to see that their health was protected in every way. They were housed, they were fed, they were clothed. Thirty-five million dollars all told, which seems a good deal more than anybody imagines, was spent by the various agencies, the Government included, for the amelioration of the trouble and suffering of those people who live in the flooded area. [Applause.] Of course, when we reach the stage of legislation on this subject there will come then the consideration of the question of how we can make the territory through which these great rivers run safe and healthful for people to live in. I think it is the policy of the administration, as it is of every man who has given thought to the question, to do everything that is sane and safe, and designed to provide against the menace of floods in the future. At the same time it might be just as well to add that if there is anybody, no matter where, in official life or out of it, who tries to take advantage of the unfortunate situation caused by the floods, to bankrupt the Treasury of the United States, without justification, he will find some opposition somewhere, and I shall be on the side of that opposition. [Applause.] I am for anything that is decent, and anything that will help the situation as it ought to be helped.

Now I come to the very interesting topic of public buildings, for which the bill carries a total of $45,520,170. This sum is composed of four major divisions—

Maintenance, repair, minor improvements, equipment, rent, etc., in connection with about 1,450 completed existing projects	$15,885,170
Purchase of the building in New York for the Customs Service	8,000,000
Acquisition of land in the triangle area in Washington	2,680,000
New construction and sites under the public buildings act of May 25, 1926	18,955,000

The amount for maintenance and repair of existing structures is very largely routine, although there is involved in it the expenses for commissioning of new buildings, additional amounts for repairs of buildings and mechanical equipment, additional personnel to improve the maintenance of existing buildings, and an amount to improve the salary situation in the custodial forces.

The $8,000,000 for the purchase of the building and site in New York is in accordance with the law, and a contract was made by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to that act. The building is now in course of construction and is expected to be completed during the next fiscal year. It will provide new quarters for the appraisers of the Customs Service, the laboratories of the Department of Agriculture, and the United States Customs Court. The Treasury Department believes that the arrangement is an advantageous one to the Government. The building is constructed under plans approved by the Treasury Department and the work is being supervised by the Architect's Office, both as to structural qualifications and costs. Any saving under the $8,000,000 contract price resulting in the letting of contracts and the purchase of materials and general execution of the work will result in decreasing the total contract price to the Government.

The $2,680,000 recommended for the purchase of land in the triangle area in Washington is recommended for the acquisition of square 256, which is almost wholly occupied by the property of the Southern Railway Co., at the junction of Thirteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue. The total property to be acquired in all of this triangle area is assessed at $16,624,000, and the act authorizing the acquisition fixed a maximum limit of expenditure of $25,000,000. The area comprises 1,131,920 square feet of land, assessed at $11,797,182, and the improvements on this land are assessed at $4,827,200.

Square 256 is the first parcel recommended for purchase under the authorization. The block contains 46,161 square feet of land, assessed at $758,770, and the improvements, including the Southern Railway Building, are assessed at $1,123,200, making a total assessed valuation for the block of $1,881,970. The property of the Southern Railway is assessed at $1,749,240, of which $661,740 represents 37,716 square feet of ground and $1,087,500 represents the structure. The building is of fireproof construction, with good foundations, and contains an available floor space of 209,603 square feet. The railway company has made a tentative offer to sell its property for $2,500,000 as against an assessed valuation of $1,749,240. While the offer is about 38½ per cent above the assessed value and seems high, the committee was of the opinion that, considering the appraisal made of the building by the architect's office on the basis of replacement less depreciation and obsolescence, and considering the assessed value of the land, that Congress would be justified in making this appropriation as a maximum amount so that negotiations could commence for favorable terms.

The amount recommended for new public-building projects throughout the country under the 1926 act is $18,955,000, made up as follows:

Section 3 buildings (1913 projects)	$1,550,000
Section 5 buildings, outside of Washington	13,905,000
Section 5 buildings, in Washington	3,500,000

The total number of projects recommended now is 81. Practically all of these were before Congress at the last session in the appropriation bill, which failed during the closing days of the session in Senate. While the amounts for each of the projects, both as to initial appropriations and limits of cost vary, either upward or downward, compared with last session, they are recommended as the result of further study of the conditions at the various localities by the joint action of the Treasury and Post Office Departments. It should be recalled that when the estimates for these buildings were submitted at the last session the survey of public-building needs of the country had just been completed, and the estimates had to be prepared quite hurriedly in order to get them in for consideration before adjournment on the 4th of March. The time that has elapsed since then has permitted a better study of the situation to be made, and that is the reason for the changes suggested in the estimates at this session.

There are five projects under section 3 of the act of May 25, 1926. These are 1913 buildings. Including the buildings in this bill and those that have heretofore been provided with enlarged limits of cost under the $15,000,000 extensions, all of the 1913 buildings will have been taken care of, with the exception of two, and, with a suitable reservation for the limit of cost on these, there will still remain a balance under the authorization of $15,000,000 of something like $600,000. There is a statement in the hearings showing the status of each of these projects.

Of the projects in the District of Columbia, there are three recommended in the bill—the Department of Commerce Building, the Internal Revenue Building, and the addition to the Government Printing Office. Including the limits of cost fixed in the bill on these projects, and on those that have heretofore been authorized for the District of Columbia, a total limit of cost will have been fixed of $45,825,000 out of the $50,000,000 maximum authorized.

Now on the so-called first year's building program under section 5, the $100,000,000 authorization, there are recommended 72 projects, all of which were here at the last session and carried in the bill that failed. The situation under the $100,000,000 authorization is this: For the buildings that are carried in this bill, there is consumed of the $100,000,000, a total of $43,655,000, which is $1,100,000 less than the amount fixed for these same projects at the last session. So while there has been an unfortunate delay of a year on the new program due to the failure of the Senate last session to pass the bill, there has been incidentally $1,100,000 saved to the $100,000,000 authorization in connection with that delay. Taking the $43,655,000 of limits of cost fixed in the bill on these projects, together with such limits as have heretofore been fixed for a few other projects under the $100,000,000, there will have been consumed in authorizations a total of $48,552,000 of the total $100,000,000, leaving for additional projects an authorization of approximately $51,500,000. To this, however, the sum of $100,000,000—authorized in the bill just approved by both Houses—should be added, so that the maximum limit of cost remaining for new projects, over and above those in this and previous appropriation bills, is a total of $151,500,000.

I have been dealing with the authorizations and limits of cost of the whole program. The rapidity with which it may be taken up depends upon a number of factors. First, the law places a restriction of maximum expenditure of $35,000,000 annually, except that any unexpended increment of the $35,000,000 remaining in one year may be carried forward and added to any subsequent year. Second, there is the physical factor of organization to supervise, prepare plans, obtain sites, secure space requirements, enter into contracts, and carry on a major construction program involving the annual expenditure of 35 or more millions a year. Third, the revenue situation of the Government must be considered as to how close to, or how far beyond, the $35,000,000 or more of expenditures we could go in any year under the amount of revenue to be available after giving heed, of course, to other needs of the Government that are just as important as the building program.

The delay of a year in starting on this first year's program has prevented the expenditure of the $25,000,000 this fiscal year. As a matter of fact, the Treasury Department, under the appropriations now on the books and those in this bill, estimates that approximately $15,000,000 will be expended this fiscal year, leaving $10,000,000 unused in the $25,000,000 limit of cost.

The raising of the annual rate of expenditure in the bill just passed by both Houses places a different situation on public-building expenditures. With the raising of that limit to $35,000,000 commencing with the fiscal year 1928, and with an estimated expenditure during that year of only $15,000,000, there would be carried forward under the new act approximately $20,000,000, all of which could be added to the $35,000,000 limit in 1929 or distributed reasonably over a period of years. My personal opinion is that it would be unwise to try to add the $20,000,000 in any single year and thus raise the expenditures in that year to $55,000,000. It would be an impossibility in 1929 both from a physical standpoint of the work involved and from the standpoint of the revenue that it would require. It would be infinitely better to spread this added increment over a period of years and do what work we can on the building program each year as sanely and efficiently and rapidly as possible.

Many questions have been asked of me personally as to what effect the addition of the $100,000,000 in authorization and the raising of the expenditure rate to $35,000,000 will have on the prospects of additional projects being taken up at this session. Prior to the passage of this new law, there could not have been any addition to the projects now before us because with the appropriations now on the books and those recommended in this bill, the Treasury Department would have been on a basis of expenditure of approximately $25,000,000 a year during the next fiscal year. Now by the passage of the new law, with the raising of the limit of cost and the increase in the rate of expenditure in any one year, the way is prepared for additional projects. To what extent that can take place at this session, I am unable to say definitely. It may depend upon a number of factors.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. We will have $10,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The preparation of estimates of cost for these projects and the priority which they should take is a question for the Treasury and Post Office Departments. From my knowledge of that situation, I believe that it is possible for the two departments to prepare a further list of buildings for consideration before adjournment. The next question that arises is the practical one of revenue. How far can the Government afford to go in public-building expenditures, in addition to those that are already covered under the present estimated revenue?

I have referred to the fact that there are seven or eight major proposals of expenditure pending for disposition, for which no specific allowance was made in connection with our estimated receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year. I have also referred to the fact that the tax bill goes $65,000,000 more in revenue decrease than is believed to be safe. The House has also added a very substantial amount to the War Department appropriation bill that was not covered in connection with our estimated receipts and expenditures. We are faced with this situation. The receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year must balance. If the tax bill goes through in its present amount and we keep adding to the expenditures, there is now doubt about such a balancing.

If the additional expenditures are necessary and desirable, and many of them are, to what extent and in what amount can we have tax reduction and still provide for all of our expenditures this next fiscal year? In my judgment there can not be any very definite answer until after March 15, when the tax payments are received and the present estimates of revenues are either verified or shown to be too large or too small. As between too much tax reduction and no reduction at all, I favor abandoning the tax bill in its present form. I indicated my attitude on it by voting against it.

It is my hope that the situation will work out so that we may have a moderate and safe tax reduction and that some additional public-building projects and other imperative expenditures may be acted on at this session. If excessive tax reduction is to jeopardize a reasonable program for public buildings and other urgent, worthy measures, the tax bill should not be enacted and the surplus should be devoted to the retirement of the public debt and a decrease in the interest charge. And after all, that would be a safe and permanent form of relieving the tax burden.

The bill carries for the support of the Post Office Department for the next year the sum of $764,950,042. This figure is $7,582,042 more than the appropriations of the current year and $3,100,000 less than the Budget estimates. The increase in postal appropriations is approximately 1 per cent. The ratio of increase in postal appropriations last year was about 2 per cent. The appropriations for the next year are not increased in the same proportion as they were for the present year, because the estimated revenue and estimated business is not as great as was anticipated. This does not necessarily indicate that there is not an increase in postal business. There is an increase, but the increase is not in as great proportion as it has been in some previous years. For example the increase in revenues for previous years over the year just preceding them has been as follows: For 1924, 7.53 per cent; for 1925, 4.65 per cent; for 1926, 10.4 per cent; 1927, 3.53 per cent; and so far this fiscal year the increase is running about 2 per cent. The appropriations were based upon increases in revenues greater in 1927 and 1928 than actually took place, and therefore we overappropriated during those years. The turnback in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1927 amounts to about $27,000,000, and unless the revenues show a greater percentage of increase for the present year than they have shown so far, the turnback for 1928 will run in excess of $14,000,000.

The service must be provided and the large items of expenditure occur in the pay of postmasters, clerks at post offices, city-delivery carriers, railway-mail clerks, railroad transportation of the mail, and the Rural Delivery Service. These six items comprise slightly in excess of 80 per cent of the entire cost of the establishment. While the appropriations for 1929, in some cases, show a small decrease under the 1928 appropriations or only a slight increase, that is not indicative of any decrease in the service. It is in fact due to the situation to which I have just referred—that there is very considerable leeway in the existing appropriations, as the unexpended balances for this year and 1927 will indicate. The estimated unexpended balance in the item for clerks at post offices alone this year is approximately $7,000,000, and a similar situation exists in some of the other items.

There is, however, a considerable increase in the fund for the City Delivery and Collection Service. The amount added for this service is $3,800,000 over the current appropriation. There is a growth in this service which seems not to bear a very direct relationship to the increase in postal revenues. It is unquestionably due to the tendency of the population in the cities to spread out over a larger area, induced unquestionably by the advent of a general expansion of motor transportation.

The appropriation for railway transportation of mail is reduced by $750,000 under the current year and $1,250,000 under the Budget. Expenditures for 1927 were about $107,000,000, and the rate for this fiscal year, while slightly in excess of that annual rate, indicates that the amount allowed in the bill, $110,250,000, should be sufficient.

In connection with railway transportation it is appropriate to discuss the star-route item, which is somewhat related to the rail carrying of mail. The appropriation for star routes is increased from $13,400,000 to $13,850,000, which is $450,000 over 1928 and $250,000 over the Budget. The committee was told that in the first six months of this year that more train service had been discontinued than during any recent similar period. There is a tendency by the railroads to take off the short-line trains, which are not very profitable operations. The discontinuance of this character of service during the fiscal year 1928 is estimated by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General at $350,000. That fact is immediately reflected in the star-route situation, because mail from discontinued-train service must be carried by bus or other star-route operators. It is because of this unusual occurrence that the committee has felt it necessary to go above the Budget and make suitable provision for star-route operation. The committee was informed that the discontinuance of these trains was not very heavily reflected in the rail transportation item, but from the investigation of the star-route item there is a very substantial relationship, one that is growing rapidly, against rail transportation than has been felt at the immediate time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed a little further. It will take about 15 minutes more. I may not need it all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. There is also an increase of $1,100,000 in the appropriation for transportation of foreign mail. This sum is occasioned by several factors. There is an increase of $46,000 on account of the adjustment of one of the six existing mail-subsidy contracts, there is $100,000 additional for more frequent vessel service to the West Indies and Porto Rico, $350,000 on account of the estimated increase in parcel-post packages sent to foreign countries as the result of the raise in weight limits for packages from 11 to 20 and 22 pounds in the case of 37 countries, $450,000 additional on account of the normal increase in the quantity of mail carried on the non-contract or poundage basis. Under this item for the transportation of foreign mail, there has been available for a number of years not to exceed $150,000 for carrying mail by seaplane. The service is now maintained between these points: Seattle and Victoria, British Columbia; New Orleans and Pilottown, La.; and Key West and Habana. The amount is increased in the bill to $300,000, to permit of increased frequency and better service to Cuba, and the possible extension of the routes to other points in the West Indies.

For the Rural Delivery Service there is a total of $106,000,000, an increase of $494,000. This amount the committee has been assured is sufficient to take care of all the additional routes that can be approved during the year and to make the necessary extensions that should be put in.

The appropriation for the contract Air Mail Service shows an apparent increase of $2,430,000 over the current appropriation of $4,000,000. This increase is actually $1,930,000, as there was available for the current fiscal year, in addition to the $4,000,000 of direct appropriation, the sum of $500,000 from the fund for the operation of the Government air mail, making a total for contract air mail of $4,500,000 for 1928. In this instance the committee has gone $430,000 over the Budget estimate. There is against this appropriation of $6,430,000 a compensating factor by the elimination from the 1928 appropriations of the sum of $2,150,000 which is the amount granted for the current year for the operation of the Government air-mail lines, due to placing such lines on a contract basis.

The situation with respect to contract air-mail routes is as follows:

	Length of route (miles)	Miles flown daily	Number of routes
Routes in operation	8,044	17,444	18
Routes contracted for and to be in operation before July 1	3,656	7,312	7
Total anticipated situation by July 1	11,700	24,756	25

Requests for additional routes are pending and there are undoubtedly meritorious routes which should be adopted. In making the addition of $430,000 to the Budget estimate the committee has provided for two factors. The statement was made by the Second Assistant Postmaster General that the sum of $6,000,000 recommended in the Budget would not be more than sufficient to cover the routes now under contract, totaling 25, considering the increase in mail being handled. If the $6,000,000 should be more than sufficient to carry existing routes, the leeway in the fund would be so narrow as to practically exclude consideration of new routes. The committee is of the opinion that some margin should be provided for the establishment of new routes in thoroughly justifiable cases and for that reason has added the sum of $400,000 to cover new lines and the sum of $30,000 to provide for four assistant air-mail superintendents and clerical assistance at the principal air-transfer points, namely, New York, Chicago, Fort Worth, and Salt Lake City.

The development of contract air-mail service has been phenomenal and has practically all taken place within the past two years. There is tremendous pressure from many places in the country for the establishment of it. While it is a great development, it is yet somewhat experimental, and should be extended sanely and with due regard for the prospects of continued success. Information as to the relation between receipts from air-mail sources and expenditures for that purpose are very meager. The best the Post Office Department was able to give the committee on this point was statistics on a seven-day test in October, 1927. Based on this information, which will be found on pages 301 and 302 of the hearings, the department figures that air-mail service at that time was on a yearly loss basis of $850,000. No allowance was made in these calculations for expenditures by the Department of Commerce in the establishment and maintenance of airways through providing lighting, communication, and radio facilities. While it would not be proper to charge to air-mail service the entire expense of maintenance and depreciation on the airway equipment, the greater proportion of the cost is directly related to the cost of carrying mail by air and should be considered in conjunction with any loss figures of the Post Office Department through the contract operation.

The committee is of the opinion that with the 25 routes which are now under contract, additional expansion of the service should be very conservative and that more attention should be devoted to the success of the lines which have already been established than to the rapid extension of the contract mileage. This is not manna, dropped down from the sky to the children of Israel. It is a thing that can only be successfully operated by the participation of the people in the cost of the operation. In other words, you have got to sell enough postage stamps under this plan to make the receipts balance the expenditures, or you can not run the air-mail service very long. It is believed that the $400,000 recommended over the Budget, together with any margin available in the $6,000,000, should be ample to cover such new lines as should be adopted, with due consideration for the success of the whole network of mileage. The committee believes that the Post Office Department should not make new contracts to an extent which will cause expenditures under existing law to run in excess of the $6,430,000, and further believes that commencement of actual operations on new routes should be contingent so far as possible upon the proper preparation of the airways for flying purposes. The committee was informed that out of 15 air-mail-route operators probably 6 were making money. This is not a very good percentage. The success of the operators is vital to a continuance of the service. For this additional reason great care should be exercised in the establishment of new routes and attention devoted toward the development and success of the existing routes. In conclusion, let me say this: Irrespective of air-mail success or any other, as Members of Congress, to the extent that we have the courage to stand up under the propaganda which is still being pounded at us, we should devote ourselves, our strength, our minds, our hearts, our determination, and our patriotism to the development of a consistent policy of proper economy in the conduct of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. To what extent are mail routes carrying passengers?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand in only one case—from San Francisco to Los Angeles.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAIL. I would like to know about the public buildings at Red Bluff, Calif., and Los Angeles.

Mr. MADDEN. San Pedro is in this bill, and Red Bluff now has $90,000 already that was carried in previous appropriation acts.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that he has just made the most informative speech that has been made in the House, I think, this year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very sure that we have all listened with a great deal of interest to the address of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], relative to the present fiscal affairs of the Nation and also in explanation of the pending bill. We all recognize that the gentleman from Illinois is a student of finance. I do not suppose there is a man connected with the Congress or with the Government who has more accurate information relative to the fiscal affairs of our Government. Successful in his private affairs before he came to Congress, he has brought to his official work here the sound business judgment and great executive ability that he showed while in private life.

The gentleman has referred to the fact that Congress has reduced the Budget estimates of the President during the period of the Budget by something like $360,000,000. I do not think it is too much to say that more largely than anyone else the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the greater portion of the credit for such reduction, because we all know that he has been a consistent advocate of economy; and while, as he says, he has had frequently to say "no," he does so always because he feels that the interests of economy and the interests of the Government demand it.

He has uttered a timely warning to the House with reference to appropriations to be made at this Congress. Of course, we know that there are propositions and projects which are pending before the House which must be considered, and, in my judgment, considered favorably, and which are going to require considerable appropriations, such as flood relief in the Mississippi Valley and other projects to which I might refer. But certainly his caution should be heeded in the House in the consideration of some of the projects that may be proposed and with the view of seeing that no more money is appropriated than is absolutely necessary.

It is not my purpose to discuss the bill now pending which makes appropriations for the Treasury Department and also the Post Office Department.

That has been done fully and thoroughly by the gentleman from Illinois. There is nothing controversial in the bill. There is no item to which I object as a member of the subcommittee which originally conducted the hearings and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations except one item of legislation in the bill, which undertakes to give to the Treasury Department the right to use the radio at public expense in the publicity to be given to the redemption of the third Liberty loan, which is to take place in September. I am opposed to that provision for several reasons. In the first place, I do not think it necessary. It seems to me the Secretary now has the widest opportunity to give publicity to the redemption of these bonds and the calling in of these bonds through the newspapers which, of course, will carry the facts, and also through the various banks of the country. Therefore I can see no reason for the additional public expense in using the radio for that purpose. We know, of course, that the holders of the smaller bonds are usually coupon holders, and naturally when they come to cash their last coupons on September 15 they will make inquiry, if they do not already know the facts, as to where they are going to get their next interest, and the banker who cashes their coupons will be there to advise them; and certainly those who are to take these bonds in the form of certificates for large amounts with lesser rates of interest will already have the information, or if they do not they will get the information from the bankers with whom they deal. I repeat, therefore, I can see no reason for injecting this camel's nose under the tent, so to speak, and in this bill provide that the radio may be used at public expense.

There is another objection to it. While I make no charge, and I am frank to say I do not believe those at the head of the Treasury Department would resort to it, we never know just how far those things may be used for political purposes, especially in a campaign year; and I think this, to say the least, is an improper time to start.

Another thing, if it is to be used by the Treasury Department you will doubtless find that next year the Commerce Department, with reference to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and other activities, and the Agricultural Department, and possibly other departments will be seeking the same privilege of using the radio at public expense for the purpose of giving to the public information which they deem expedient. Whether it is used for political purposes this year or in the years to come, we know that those things will naturally creep in.

It is only fair to say that Undersecretary Mills, when asked as to the possibility of this, assured the committee that there was no such purpose, and I am sure there is not. He assured the committee that whatever was said with reference to these bonds would be closely censored either by him or some other responsible official in the Treasury Department. That may be true, but I do not think the present administration or the next administration, no matter what may be its political complexion, should be given the opportunity to use the radio for this purpose, especially, as I say, when there is no real need for it, as I view it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said this was legislation on an appropriation bill, and if that is true, a point of order will undoubtedly strike it out.

Mr. BYRNS. I think so, and I will say that if nobody else makes the point of order I propose to make it myself.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much is carried for that purpose?

Mr. BYRNS. There is no amount carried. It is to be paid for out of expenses of loans, and, of course, there are several million dollars in the hands of the Treasury for that purpose. I think something was said to the effect that it probably would not cost much over $4,000 or $5,000, but no one can tell what it will cost. Regardless of the expense, for the reasons I have stated, I do not think there is any necessity for using it now.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, as I said, I do not care to discuss the pending bill. It has already been very fully discussed by the gentleman from Illinois, but I want to ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments while I make some reference to the speech which was made by the President of the United States and by the Director of the Budget at the so-called business organization meeting held on January 30 last.

The President delivered a very carefully prepared and excellent address on the importance and value of economy in government. It was intended, of course, to reach the ears of millions of his radio audience. He saw fit to content himself with generalities and homilies on the value of economy, with which everyone agrees, rather than a demonstration by the citation of facts and figures from the expenditures made during the five years of his administration that there had been either economy or a reduction of governmental expenditures during his term of office. He frequently referred to "constructive economy," a phrase which he coined a year or more ago as a substitute for the economy which had been theretofore asserted was being practiced by the administration. "Constructive economy" may mean anything or everything. It may mean one thing to one person and something entirely different to another. Was it "constructive economy" when the President recommended appropriations to Congress during the period of the Budget, which Congress reduced approximately $360,000,000, thereby saving that amount to the Treasury? Was it the idea of "constructive economy" which influenced the President to do something which his three immediate predecessors had refused to do, when he urged Congress to purchase out of the Treasury of the people the unprofitable and unsalable stock of New York and other stockholders in the Cape Cod Canal off the Massachusetts coast at a cost of $11,500,000, and which will ultimately cost twenty-five or thirty million to put into operation?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I think the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal was recommended during a former Democratic administration both by the President and the Secretary of War.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. My positive recollection is—of course, I am always subject to correction—that no President ever recommended the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal until President Coolidge recommended it.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand it, President Coolidge took up the matter where the other administration had left off, and that Secretary Baker conducted the first negotiations.

Mr. BYRNS. But it was never recommended to Congress by any President in any message until President Coolidge recommended it.

Mr. DENISON. I am not saying it was done in a message by the President.

Mr. BYRNS. That was the statement I made.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois has made the best possible argument he could have in favor of the proposition, namely, that some Democrat at one time favored it.

Mr. DENISON. Well, not some Democrat; but it was the Democratic administration that first recommended and urged that we purchase the canal.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That makes it that much stronger.

Mr. BYRNS. The question is not whether a Democratic administration favored it, but whether or not the President recommended it in a formal message and urged Congress to accept it, and I will repeat that I think the gentleman will find, if he will look into the record, that no President ever recommended its purchase until President Coolidge recommended it.

Mr. DENISON. My friend from Tennessee is dodging behind the question of a formal recommendation in a formal message. I do not take issue with him on that, because I do not remember, but I am positive it was a Democratic administration, as I stated, that started the proposition of purchasing the Cape Cod Canal.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will state to the gentleman, for the information of the gentleman from Illinois, that it was claimed that a Democratic administration had made some implied agreement by which the canal would have to be taken over, but, as a matter of fact, it was taken over for the purposes of the war and it was denied it had that signification.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank my friend for his contribution, because he is more familiar with the situation than I am.

Mr. DENISON. I dislike to interrupt my friend from Tennessee, but let us keep the record straight. The canal was taken over during the war like we took over all the railroads, and it was while it was in the possession of the Government and under its control that President Wilson began negotiations or instructed his Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy to enter into negotiations to purchase the canal, and the entire proceeding was following the recommendations of that administration. I happened to be on the committee that had the hearings on the bill in the first place.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know what the Secretary of War, under the Democratic administration, may have done or what investigations he may have made; but I do know that whatever his investigations were, his opinion of what should be done was not such that it brought about a recommendation on the part of a Democratic administration that Congress make the purchase, because, of course, it was necessary for Congress to ratify and approve and to make the appropriation necessary to buy the stock of the canal.

I respectfully submit to my friend from Illinois that if the Secretary of War, after this investigation which the gentleman insists that he made, had come to the conclusion it was a proper thing for Congress to make the appropriation and purchase the canal, a recommendation would have come forward in due course and in the proper way from the President of the United States, and this was not done, by the admission of the gentleman himself.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was not the first appropriation we recommended in a bill $6,000,000, and was not that set out as the real value of the canal?

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is correct. The first appropriation was for $5,500,000, if I remember correctly, in cash, and the balance was to be appropriated later.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understood the amount was to be $6,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not insist on this argument with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] because the gentleman from Illinois is trying to approve of the Democratic administration. I think, however, he is like the fellow who said he had never refused a drink but once, and that time he did not understand the gentleman. I think the only time the gentleman from Illinois is approving the Democratic administration of President Wilson, he is in error as to the facts.

Mr. BYRNS. It is gratifying, of course, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] should approve of the Democratic administration.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The Democratic Congress itself passed a bill authorizing the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. And that was during a Democratic administration. The act of Congress during Mr. Wilson's administration authorized the administration to enter into a contract for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal, if this could be done upon a proper basis; and if not, to condemn it.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the gentleman says this was done during a Democratic administration. That administration closed in March, 1921, and the gentleman knows we had a Republican Congress during the last two years of that administration. Is the gentleman absolutely sure that the authorization act for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal was passed prior to 1921?

Mr. DENISON. I think it was.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is clearly mistaken.

Mr. DENISON. I may be in error, but I think it was.

Mr. BYRNS. It was less than two years ago when that act was passed, and it was passed after Mr. Coolidge submitted his recommendation to the Congress urging Congress to pass it. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman is not any more correct about the action and attitude of President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker than he is with reference to when the act was passed, I suggest to the gentleman that he look up the record.

Mr. DENISON. I do not want to make any statement that I do not know to be absolutely correct, but I am sure the act authorizing the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal was passed during the Democratic administration, and that following the passage of the act Secretary of War Baker entered into negotiations for its purchase. He could not agree on the purchase price and then he authorized condemnation proceedings and a jury fixed the award of damages.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not care to prolong the matter, but I will say to the gentleman that the act authorizing the appropriation for its purchase was passed within the last two years, but I shall look up the record so as to be absolutely certain about it and refer to it later. I do not want to make any statement that is not in exact accordance with the facts.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I was elected to Congress in 1922 and took my seat on the 4th of March, 1923, and the matter has been up since I have been here.

Mr. DENISON. I am talking about the original act, of course.

Mr. BYRNS. I understood the gentleman to refer to the authorization act.

Mr. DENISON. And that was passed long before my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], came to Congress.

Mr. BYRNS. Was it "constructive economy" which induced his recommendation to build a great monumental bridge across the Potomac River here in the District of Columbia exclusively out of the funds in the United States Treasury at a cost of $15,000,000, and which some have declared will cost many millions more before the structure and approaches are fully completed? This, too, his predecessors in office had refused to recommend.

Was it "constructive economy" which, in 1922, brought about the scrapping of newly completed modern battleships and others in process of completion and under contract at a cost of approximately $278,000,000 to the people, and in 1928, just six years thereafter, the recommendation of a new five-year naval construction program to cost approximately $1,250,000,000, with an annual upkeep of $60,000,000, not taking into consideration the replacements, which will cost another $1,250,000,000 during the five-year period?

Other instances might be cited but these are sufficient to show that the phrase "constructive economy" may be applied to any expenditure, dependent upon the viewpoint of the one making use of the term. It may be applied to expenditures wholly unnecessary from the public viewpoint, or it may be applied to expenditures made necessary by faulty business management.

The truth is that real economy needs no qualifying adjective, and when a qualifying adjective becomes necessary it ceases to be economy according the general acceptation of the true meaning of economy.

The Director of the Budget also delivered an address on this occasion. And let me say that I have a very warm and affectionate regard for the director, as I also have the greatest respect for the President. I have had occasion to speak many times of the high admiration I entertain for General Lord and the splendid service rendered by him as Director of the Budget. But he is rather hard put to it when in order to show a reduction of expenditures under the present administration he has to compare present-day expenditures with those of 1921, when the country was just emerging from the heavy expenses of the World War; when our Army and Navy had not been fully demobilized; when war agencies and contracts were still hanging over and being closed out; and when the Government was having to pay the losses incurred in taking over the railroads and other activities made necessary by the war.

He complains at those who have seen fit heretofore to compare present-day expenditures with those of 1916, the last full fiscal year before the war under a Democratic administration, when the total expenditures of the Government were only one-fourth of what they are to-day. He says that they might as well go back to the days of the Revolutionary War. By the same logic may it not be said that he might just as well have compared present-day expenditures with those of 1918 when the Government reached the peak of its war expenditures, as to compare them with 1921 when the country had not fully emerged from its war expenditures?

Why not compare them with the previous years of the present administration? Mr. Coolidge became President in August, 1923. There have been five fiscal years since that time. Surely a comparison of the expenditures of this fiscal year with those of the first fiscal year of the Coolidge administration will show whether there has been a reduction of Federal expenditures under the Coolidge administration. It is significant that neither of the distinguished speakers sought to do this.

The total actual expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924—the first under President Coolidge—were $4,079,626,493.73. The estimated total expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, are $4,331,814,285, an increase of $252,187,791.25 in five years under the administration of President Coolidge. And do not overlook the fact that the Government is paying $220,602,912.92 less in 1928 in interest on the public debt than it did in 1924 and $7,000,000 less in pensions. If these sums be added—and it is entirely proper to do so—it will be seen that the total expenditures of the Government in 1928 are over $479,500,000 more than they were in 1924, the first year of the Coolidge administration. There may be some who will class this as "constructive economy." I dare say that there are few who will call it real economy.

The total expenditures by fiscal years during the administration of President Coolidge are as follows:

1924	$4,079,626,493.75
1925	4,129,234,923.68
1926	4,230,851,302.36
1927	4,176,706,508.06
1928 (estimated)	4,331,814,285.00

It is proper to say that each year there has been from forty to fifty millions less to pay in interest on the public debt than in the preceding year, and usually less in pensions and other post-war obligations. So the increase each year for the operations of the Government is really greater than the figures indicate. It will be observed that the only year in which there has been a decrease from the preceding year was in the fiscal year 1927, but that the expenditures for that year were considerably larger than those for the fiscal years 1925 and 1924. Attention should be called to the fact that $44,918,121.98 less in interest on the public debt and $9,000,000 less for the Veterans' Bureau was paid in 1927 than in 1926. So it will be seen that the figures given for 1927 do not present the real picture by way of comparison with 1926. There was actually a considerable increase in the cost of Government operations over 1926.

Great stress was laid in the President's address on the reduction of the public debt in the sum of approximately $8,500,000,000. It was heralded as evidence of the sound business policy and economy of the administration and a great service to the country. No mention was made or credit given to a Democratic administration for a large part of this reduction.

The public debt at its peak on August 31, 1919, was $26,596,000,000. Prior to March, 1921, under a Democratic administration, it was reduced to $24,051,000,000, a net reduction of $2,545,000,000 in 19 months. On June 30, 1927, the public debt was $18,512,000,000, a total reduction of about $8,084,000,000. Of this sum, approximately $5,539,000,000 represents the reduction during the six years of the Harding-Coolidge administrations. But it is not entitled, as the President assumes, to the credit for the full amount of that reduction. I have many times called attention to the cash assets inherited from the Wilson administration by the Harding-Coolidge administrations. Those cash assets came from various sources, such as the sale of surplus war supplies, collection on loans to railroads during the Wilson administration, back taxes collected on taxes levied during the war and under a Democratic administration, and other sources, amounting in the aggregate to $3,786,00,000. I present a compilation of figures which was made by my colleague, Judge HULL, and which shows the sources and amounts of these assets:

Practically, cash assets inherited by Harding-Coolidge administrations and amount of net receipts to Treasury, fiscal years 1922 to 1927, inclusive:

War Finance Corporation	$157,247,000
Receipts from sale of Federal farm loan bonds	199,928,000
Railroads	442,652,000
Grain Corporation	7,000,000
Total	806,827,000
Add:
Foreign debt interest and repayments	841,000,000
Back taxes collected after 1920 for 1917, net	1,300,000,000
German payments for Army occupation	25,000,000
Sale of surplus war supplies, including transfers and withdrawals	492,949,000
Reduction of balance in general fund on June 30, 1921	321,000,000
Total	3,776,776,000
Public debt reduction prior to Mar. 3, 1921	2,545,000,000
Grand total	6,321,776,000
Debt of the Federal Government when at its peak, Aug. 31, 1919, was	26,596,000,000
Feb. 28, 1921, it was	24,051,000,000
Reduction	2,545,000,000
Total gross debt, Feb. 28, 1921	24,051,000,000
June 30, 1927, it was	18,512,000,000
Reduction	5,539,000,000
Grand total reduction from Aug. 31, 1919, to July, 1927	8,084,000,000
The amount of reduction prior to Mar. 4, 1921, $2,545,000,000, plus Treasury receipts from cash assets left by Wilson administration, $3,786,000,000	6,332,000,000
Total reduction for which Harding-Coolidge administrations supplied money	1,752,000,000

It will be seen from this table that the total amount of reduction in six years in which the Harding-Coolidge administrations supplied the money was $1,752,000,000, and that, too, during a period of high taxes.

One of the many highly constructive measures passed by a Democratic Congress and approved by a Democratic President was the sinking fund act, under which a certain sum is paid annually into the sinking fund for the reduction of the public debt. This fund alone will wipe out more than $10,000,000,000 of our public debt by 1946. The amounts paid on the public debt from this fund for the fiscal years 1922 to 1927, inclusive, are more than the said sum of $1,752,000,000 for which the Harding-Coolidge administrations can claim to have supplied the cash. So it may be fairly said that the present administration owes some credit for even this reduction to the wisdom and foresight of a Democratic administration. The amounts paid during these years are as follows:

1922	$275,896,000.00
1923	284,149,754.16
1924	294,927,019.57
1925	306,666,736.01
1926	321,184,468.20
1927	336,890,832.47
Total	1,819,714,810.41

The wise Lincoln said:

You can fool a part of the people all the time and all the people a part of the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time.

It is about time the people were becoming aroused to the fact that despite the persistent and misleading propaganda of the past years there has been no reduction of Government expenditures. On the contrary, there has been a heavy increase, which can not be entirely justified on the plea that it was "constructive economy." [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to again call attention of the House to the situation brought about by the present immigration law. I realize that this is a very sensitive subject for a great many Members of the House, for there seems to be an attitude of refusing to even consider the situation. Any suggestion made by some of us who come from the large cities is viewed with a great deal of disfavor, and yet for the last three or four years the President has specifically recommended in his message to Congress an amendment which will humanize the law.

In his last message of the first session of the Seventieth Congress he suggested "further legislation to provide for uniting families when the husband or wife is in this country."

We have been seeking for some time to have the laws humanized to that extent. When I make such suggestions that is to amend the law permitting a mother or father of a citizen to come in as a nonquota immigrant, I do not believe it is fair to say that it is an attempt to lower the bars or attempt to cause a large influx of immigrants which would have a tendency to disturb labor conditions in this country.

I state frankly that there is no desire on my part or in the minds of most of the gentlemen who are urging an amendment of the law, I am sure, to so let down the bars as to bring such a large number of laborers into the country as to lower wages or cause increased unemployment. I am sure after my statement on the coal situation the other day and the attitude I have always taken on labor conditions in this country, it will be plain that I desire to keep up the American standard of living, and that I can not be fairly charged with seeking in any way to disturb labor conditions.

But something must be done to humanize the law to make it possible for families to be united.

It is no relief to extend or add more classes of immigrants to the preferential class, because the quota number from countries like Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Russia, and Italy is so limited that to extend any more of the preferential quota is no relief at all. In fact, it complicates and would make present conditions even worse.

For instance, take a man to-day who is sending for his mother in Italy or in Poland, where the amount of the quota is 3,800—1,900 regular quota and 1,900 preferential. It would take years before her turn as a preferential quota immigrant would be reached. In all likelihood she would die before that time.

What we need is an amendment which would permit the bringing in of a citizen's mother or father as nonquota immigrants, and place the wife of a declarant or "first-paper" man also in the nonquota class.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of humanizing the law. Can the gentleman tell us—I understand it is ascertained or is being ascertained—how many citizens in New York State, or especially in New York City, are now out of a job and how many there are in Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia without jobs? We want first to humanize them with jobs here at home.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment that I have in mind would not bring in a solitary worker.

Mr. BLANTON. Everybody works in America if they can. The women all work in some way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me make my speech, please. Take the young man who arrives in this country around the age of 30. He lives here seven or eight years and becomes a citizen. He is 38 years old and he wants his father and mother to come here; they naturally are elderly and do not come here to work; are not going to compete in the labor market. They simply come here to live with their children.

Mr. BLANTON. But when he sends for his 18-year-old son he is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They can come in now under the law.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from New York helped to get that provision into the law. Every time one of these 18-year-old immigrants comes in he competes with somebody already here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say this to the gentlemen, that I have been seeking by my support of labor legislation and by my activity in labor organizations to bring up the standard of living, and have contributed a great deal toward that end. I can point to many, many instances where I have been instrumental in increasing wages and making the American standard of living something more than a mere figure of speech.

Mr. BLANTON. I am helping them along that line myself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman's record will speak for itself. I am very glad that the gentleman has interrupted me to the extent of suggesting that the fear is, in bringing in a large number of these aged parents, that they would compete in the labor market. I congratulate the labor unions on the new recruit to their cause.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not a fact that before these mothers and fathers can come in a bond must be given to assure the Government that they will not become a charge on the Government of the United States?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If there is any doubt, yes. Statistics will show that there is hardly any possibility of these aged parents becoming public charges. In the first place, the children must be able to pay their passage over here, and then when they arrive he must make a showing that they are able and willing to properly take care of their parents. If there is the slightest doubt about that, the Government properly asks for a bond. Not only has the President of the United States in his messages repeatedly recommended the humanizing of this law, but Commissioner General of Immigration Hull suggested that he would urge that the wife of an immigrant who is here legally under quota be allowed to join a husband. That is not an unreasonable demand to make.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, nobody would object to that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is fine. Will the gentleman vote for such an amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I will vote to let any spouse join the other where there was a former marriage, but not subsequent ones.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is fine; I shall depend upon the gentleman's help.

Mr. BLANTON. I have such a bill now pending before the Committee on Immigration to permit that very thing.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Take, for instance, a man who is here legally, with no doubt of his legal status, who was married prior to the time that he came to the United States. Surely to permit his wife to come in would in no way interfere with the restrictive policy laid down by the Government at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. That is his legal wife, not his common-law wife.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course not. Besides there are not many common-law wives in Europe.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there are a great many of them in some parts of Europe.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no. I served in the American Consular Service for five years, and I say to the gentleman and to this House that the system of registration and the records of vital statistics in the older countries of Europe are far more perfect than they are in many of the States in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. How about Russia?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, they have marriage over there.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but they have common contracts, too, that are separable at will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why, common-law marriage is legal in this country.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean they have contract of cohabitation that does not even go so far as common-law marriage.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the gentleman's State and in my State it is possible for a man and woman to enter into an agreement of marriage that is absolutely valid.

Mr. BLANTON. And it requires a divorce in court to separate them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. But in Russia it does not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are not legislating for Russia. We are legislating for the United States. Anyway, I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the gentleman advocate the recognition of Russia by the United States?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That does not mean that we are going to attempt to regulate their internal affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. But when you advocate that and you let one of them come here I do not want him to send for all of his contractees.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the gentleman here appropriates every year for our diplomatic representatives in Turkey, and in Turkey they have harems. We can not regulate the internal affairs of other countries.

Mr. BLANTON. I was not trying to do that, but I was just speaking of permitting only real, lawful wives to enter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the immigration law is very clear on that.

Mr. Chairman, every time we speak on this subject the charge is made that an "alien bloc" is seeking to break down the laws of the United States. I have here an announcement of an organization called the Key Men of America, who were advertising, who were suggesting, that something must be done to break down the influence of "alien groups." I say frankly to both parties on both sides of the aisle that I never hear this kind of talk about "alien groups" around the October time of the year. In fact, to the contrary—these good naturalized citizens are then treated with a great deal of deference—I therefore appeal to treat them right now and permit them to send for their aged parents who desire to come here and live permanently with their children.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman, as he goes along, mention the various classes that he would like to get in, outside of the present law—the wives of aliens who are not citizens and their fathers and mothers and children?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of citizens?

Mr. HOLADAY. Of citizens. Just how many millions there will be in each case.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not think there will be any millions. I know it would not be anything like a million.

Mr. HOLADAY. How many unmarried aliens not citizens does the gentleman think are in the United States now?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Unmarried?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would not affect them.

Mr. HOLADAY. But they could marry and immediately bring in their wives.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I would not go that far.

Mr. HOLADAY. Then the furthest the gentleman would go would be only to those previously married?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. If a man is here now, who is not married, and he goes abroad and marries, knowing the law, of course he can not complain if his family is divided. I would limit it to those who were married prior to their emigration.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman remembers that the present law of 1924 will have been in effect five years a year from July, so that everyone that enters after that time will have had an opportunity of becoming a citizen and bringing his wife and children in.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. And we had a temporary law two years before that, so that we may say that every alien who is in this country now has been here six years, with notice that he could not bring in his wife and children.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman must look at the practical situation. As the gentleman knows, an alien can not apply for his second papers until five years have elapsed. In New York City it takes at least from one year to a year and a half before that man can obtain a verification of his arrival in order to be put on the list. These men as a rule are hard-working men, unskilled laborers. They work from early morning until late at night, and many of them have no opportunity to acquire a sufficient knowledge of the English language to pass the examination. The gentleman from Illinois had a part in the framing of the law.

Mr. HOLADAY. No; not the first law, under which he applies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I refer to the final test. If the immigrant is a young man and goes to school, he acquires the language easily. It is easy for him to acquire it. But in the case of the laborer who works from morning to night, and works to send money to the other side, for example, to support his wife, it is difficult for him to acquire sufficient knowledge of the English language to successfully pass the test on his application for the final papers; so that it is not a lack of interest on the part of the alien, not a lack of desire on his part to become a citizen, but simply that his condition will not permit him within the time the gentleman suggests, the period of five years, to acquire the requisite knowledge.

I pointed out some of the trick questions asked in the examination, and I told the gentleman, I think, privately, of a case where an applicant was before the examiner to be tested in English, and the examiner gave him an advertisement in a newspaper of a New York trust company, and then asked him what a trust company was. I submit, there are Members of this House who could not give an exact definition of what a trust company is. I am willing to limit the nonquota status to the wives of aliens who are here and who have applied for their first papers and who are otherwise eligible.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to get the gentleman back to the American standard of living. What are you going to do with all these jobless Americans when you bring in more? How do you answer that question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not advocating the bringing in of any who will enter the competitive labor market.

Mr. BLANTON. Everybody who comes in produces something, even if it is not anything more than knitted socks. It enters the competitive market.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not if they keep house.

Mr. BLANTON. We have not many idlers here in America except those who only clip coupons off of bonds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not get this out of books, or out of examining statistics, or out of my imagination. If you come up to my district, as I hope the gentleman will do some time, I will show him thousands and thousands of homes there where these good wives are bringing up their families and sending their children to school. They keep their homes—they are mothers of good loyal Americans. That is the work they do. You say if these aliens come her to work, you do not want them; and if they do not work, you do not want them for some other reason. You pass an illiteracy test, and say, "We will keep the illiterates out because they are ignorant," and then after the literacy test you say that those who come here are too smart. Some of us who happen to be sons of immigrants have taken an active part in the bringing about of improving the conditions of the immigrant. When an immigrant arrives here now he is well advised as to labor conditions and is warned against being exploited. We have broken down the padrone system. Now we have this proposition: Before the illiteracy test was imposed it was claimed that immigrants were too ignorant; now when they pass the literacy test it is claimed they are too smart. It is impossible to satisfy some people who are opposed to any kind of immigration. Yet this country was settled, built up, and made great by immigrants.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I think reference was made to Indians, who are prisoners in the land of their birth, on this continent. Do I understand that the gentleman believes that the restrictive features of the immigration act should be made somewhat more flexible in order to inflict less hardship?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. I say the mothers and fathers of naturalized citizens here should be admitted as nonquota immigrants, and that the wife of a man who has been admitted to the United States, and has applied for his second papers, should be likewise admitted as a nonquota immigrant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. In order to accentuate the gentleman's position, I want to make a statement concerning one of the most heartbreaking cases that ever came to my notice, a case where I could obtain no relief, although I applied to the Commissioner of Immigration and to the Committee on Immigration. It was the case of a young woman who came to this country and landed at New Orleans. She was detained as an illegal immigrant, but was later released on habeas corpus proceedings, and apparently the case was forgotten.

She married and a child was born to her, and then the immigration division took cognizance of the fact that the woman was not a native-born American and she was deported. Thousands of women down there could not understand the harshness of a provision by which that was done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The law which Congress passed was mandatory, and the law had to be carried out. It is the law that is cruel, not the immigration officials.

Now, as to this question of alien blocs, there is no such thing as an alien bloc here or anywhere in the United States. All this discussion about people being controlled by an alien group is absolutely unfounded. Because aliens now refuse to be herded and exploited is the reason why some now refer to them so disparagingly. They are standing up for their rights and are justified in asking Congress to repeal the cruel provisions of a law that separates their families.

I have here a circular which was sent into my district by the same people who refer to "alien groups" urging the voters of my district to vote against me, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], and Mr. Perlman because we had advocated these humanizing measures. Apparently, it is all right for these self-styled hundred per centers to make such an appeal. I want to say, and I can not say it too emphatically, that there is no difference between an American, whether he is of the first generation or of the fifth generation. The only difference between some of us is that my people came on immigrant ships, and I tell the truth about it, while some of you men say your people came over on the Mayflower, and it must have been a pretty big ship.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is such a good lawyer and logician that I am trying to follow him. I have noticed that every time we try to restrict the quota and lower it the gentleman wants to raise it. How does the gentleman square that with his position that we must uphold the American standard of living? How is the gentleman going to do that when you permit them to come in by hordes?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that I have been consistent in that and my record is consistent. I have done nothing else but seek to oppose legislation that was the result of narrow-mindedness and bigotry. That is all I have done. I remember some of the discussions here on the floor of the House when the 1924 bill was before us, and those discussions were absolutely the result of racial and religious hatred. My stand on that is absolutely consistent, and my record in attempting to uphold the American standard of living is not purely theoretical or oratorical. I have been on the picket line and I have helped thousands and thousands of people to get a sufficient wage with which to live up to that American standard of living. The trouble is that you are always willing to talk about the American standard of living when you are discussing a tariff bill and you are always willing to talk about the American standard of living when you are making a 4th of July speech, but you resent the idea of putting it into every-day practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am asking this time in order to request unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing some excerpts from a speech made by Ernest H. Van Fossan, a member of the Board of Tax Appeals. The speech was delivered at Cincinnati on the 1st day of December to the Lawyers' Club there. It is not a wet or dry speech, nor is it a speech of law enforcement. It is different. It deals with the observance of law, and because of the splendid preparation it shows I am asking the privilege of extending my remarks by inserting it in the RECORD.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how long is it?

Mr. MURPHY. It will take about one-half page of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks I insert an excerpt from an address delivered by Ernest H. Van Fossan, member of the United States Board of Tax Appeals, before the Lawyers' Club, of Cincinnati, Ohio, December 1, 1927, which is as follows:

If you will bear with me further, there is one thought that I would like to leave in your minds which, it seems to me, challenges the attention of every citizen of the United States, and especially should it command the attention of a group of lawyers. I refer to the growing spirit of lawlessness. It has long been my feeling that we have had too much talk about law enforcement and too little thought about law observance. Law enforcement is a duty of the State delegated to certain officials. Law observance is a duty of the individual and can not be delegated. If we had real law observance we would have no problem of law enforcement. In the face of the growing prevalence of lawlessness and individual indifference, no clear-minded citizen can have any honest doubt as to where his duty lies. Either the Constitution, the Federal and State laws, and municipal ordinances must be observed and enforced or America must face the prospect of being a nation of lawbreakers and criminals. There is no twilight zone. There can be no temporizing with lawlessness.

A city, a State, or a nation is but a group of people united by a common interest in their mutual welfare. Each organization partakes of the nature of its component factors. Their understanding is its understanding; their prejudices are its prejudices; their limitations are its limitations; their success is its success; their failures are its failures. In so far as the citizens of our Nation, you and I, are law-abiding, just so far and no farther will we have a law-abiding nation. In so far as we violate the law, we will have a nation of lawbreakers.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not a prophet of gloom. I do not believe America is on the verge of a great cataclysm, either political or moral or spiritual. The heart of America is sound. There is nothing fundamentally wrong with the world. The law of gravity still obtains. Newton's three laws of motion are still tenable. The stars are not wavering in their courses, nor do I think that society is dying. There is something deep down in the soul of America that rises to meet the challenge of every threat when the danger is understood. True, we are discarding some of the worn-out garments of a former day and donning a wardrobe of the newly revealed truth. But this is not revolutionary. It is merely the application of the law of life. It is practical evolution.

Society is never static. The world moves on. Nations rise and nations fall. Men are born, grow to manhood, and pass to eternity. We invent new devices and machines, discover new elements, harness new forces of nature, devise new ways to ease our burdens, and just as things mechanical move and are in a state of constant change, even so our minds, our thoughts, our traditions, our understandings are evolving. Even so is truth ever revealed. Yet the beauty of the sunset is as real as the beauty of the dawn. Some things never become obsolete. Time has tested and experience has proven the soundness of our fundamental law. And were I gifted with the power of leadership, possessed I a tongue that could stir up the hearts of men, nothing would more strongly appeal to me than to call you to the defense of our Constitution, of the law, of the traditions we cherish most, of the principles that have made America great.

I would instill the courage to speak our minds. To acquiesce and to agree is easy. It is the mark of the weakling; but it takes courage to talk back. When we hear men attack the law and our institutions; when they declare the modern age to be an age of disintegration; when they say that government is a failure; that all Government officials are grafters, or some other such thing, what do we do? Do we meekly agree? Are we cowed into tacit concurrence? Or do we take up the gage of battle and defend the law or the principle we know to be right? It isn't true that our government is a failure or that all officials are grafters or that the law is no longer deserving of our support. Our institutions are just as sound as they ever were. It is we who have failed. The law is but the bony skeleton of the institution of government. Men are its flesh and blood. It is we who have deserted the cause in its hour of need.

It is we, proud citizens of America, who allow her name to be bandied about because we lack the courage of our convictions; who permit other nations to mock us and jeer at our institutions—all because we—you and I—have failed to do our duty. Duty is either positive or negative—it is never neutral. You can not remain neutral in any crisis and not become a nonentity. And that is what too many of us have become—civic and political nonentities.

My friends, the law of the atom is the law of the mass. As does the individual, so does the Nation; our mind is the Nation's mind; our heart the Nation's heart; our strength the Nation's strength; our courage the Nation's courage; our soul the Nation's soul. To everyone of us there comes a challenge. Are we equal to the responsibility?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am rather sorry that I shall not be able to consume 30 minutes, owing to a serious throat trouble, but I have risen, as a member of the committee in charge of this bill, to discuss some phases of the bill. Unlike the position I assumed last year, I am in favor of every dollar in this bill which has been set aside for the enforcement of prohibition. [Applause.] I have a reason. At last we have a prohibition commissioner in America whom we can trust. He has not been on the job very long, but I have known him since prohibition has been the law of the land. He has appeared before our subcommittee year in and year out in a subordinate capacity, and he is the ablest and most honest man ever connected with the Prohibition Unit who has come before the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore I feel it my duty to stand with Doctor Doran and try to help him rather than in any way, shape, or form try to hamper him. I want that definitely understood. Whatever else I may say has nothing to do with prohibition enforcement as performed by certain Government officials. However, Mr. Chairman, to proceed. Lawlessness, like a cancer, grows more dangerous and destructive by the tolerance of its existence; and we are learning that prohibition grows more insolent and intolerant daily in its efforts to distort law and invent new methods of oppressing a foolishly submissive people. The pigmies of prohibition are strangling the American Gulliver and inaugurating the reign of misrule.

Prohibition, as promulgated by the pulpit-thumpers, parsons, and predatory prophets of the Anti-Saloon League, declares in effect that the Constitution and laws of the American Republic are subordinate to the eighteenth amendment and its interpretation by the giant intellect of Volstead. So we have come to the pass where the laws framed to guarantee the personal, political, and religious freedom of our citizens are as though written in water; those which safeguarded the home have become meaningless phrases; those limiting and prescribing the right of search have been torn to tatters by an army of spies, sneaks, and smellers; the physician saves life at the peril of his freedom since prohibition has made medicine a beverage; industry is very often indicted when it turns a wheel or perfects a perfume with alcohol.

Prohibition, its proconsuls, parasites, and plug uglies, has even reserved to itself and its allies a monopoly of murder, murder without penalty. The right to murder Americans abroad without fear or favor it delegates to Mexico and kindred bandit organizations; the right to murder Americans at home by poisonous liquors remains with the Anti-Saloon League and its allied bootleggers; and the right to wreck and drown American sailors and shoot up foreign seamen goes to its rum cruisers. Floggings, gougings, and arsons are the special privileges of prohibition's standing army—the Knights of the Night Shirt.

But let us point out that these lords of misrule can at times use finesse and practice restraint. Certain-lee! Observe the Lowman. He draws the line; nay, he frowns on the stealthy activities of the gas-meter men seeking to smell out stills in our best cellars. Lowman believed that was getting too close to home and might prove embarrassing. The demure deacon with a demijohn in the depths of the cellar might raise the devil with a Lowman who was a high man in the ancient order of the pump. No cellar snoopers for him!

His brilliant mind, his bristling brain, could conceive greater flights of fancy and bolder strokes of fantastic fanaticism far meeter than gas meters. He discovered the dubious depravity of ice and ginger ale, which were mere cloaks for booze. The intent to use them as such became criminal at once and called insistently for the application of the padlock law, which regretably applies only to doors, but which later it is expected may be applied to the mouths of the incurably wet in Congress. But we anticipate northern New York and its hot and heroic prohibition Lochinvar.

How were innocent ice and ginger ale to be convicted? How was justice—Volstead justice—to catch them in flagrante delicto and learn their intent to join forces and foregather with the wicked hip flasks? Here is where the genius of Lowman and the league will show a victory of mind over matter, which will materialize in more Volstead jobs, more juicy grafts, more disasters to the demon rum. Not all the ingenuity of prohibition died with Wayne Wheeler.

Prohibition will at once call to its colors and enlist the services of all the dry, trustworthy, and meritorious mind readers, telepaths, mediums, seers, sorcerers, occultists, second sighters, astralists, and workers in magic and spells, from the Great Lakes to the Rio Grande, and from San Diego, Calif., to Sacarappa, Me., and learn absolutely what is on the mind and what is the ulterior intent of ice and ginger ale in every cafe and hotel in America; and, if necessary, ring in all the witch doctors and Voodoo men in the Sunny South.

With ginger ale and ice stopped, strapped, and subdued, Lowman and the league can move on to nobler triumphs, padlock the town pump, gag the Mississippi River, arrest the rainmaker, paralyze the ocean, suppress the tank drama, and thwart the irrigation schemes of Congress. Having desiccated America, debauched religion, debased Christianity, and produce a glorious race of one-half of 1 per cent Americans, triumphant prohibition can advance to the attainment of its ultimate ideal—the establishment of hell on earth.

These are parlous times. These are days when the Republic, that was created out of the sweat and blood of Washington and his heroic companions, appears to be slipping from its moorings and we, the elected guardians of its safety and security, are bound in helplessness in the amazing entanglements of that new dispensation of prohibition and its pump-water prophets. As I look at contemporary America, throttled by the greasy, greedy hands of the Volsteadists, I wonder after all if the ideals and creeds of those allied infamies, the Anti-Saloon League and Calles of Mexico, are to supersede the principles and practices of Washington and Jefferson and become the new Americanism. The old men of the old days had their eyes on the dawn and sunrise; America to-day is marching back to medievalism and kingcraft, to servile days and ways, when liberty was the vision of the few and the scourge and manacle the portion of the many.

The latest development of prohibition should interest this House, since it is another chapter in the decline and fall of American liberty under the direction of what I may call, to parody the famous lines of that poet of humanity, Boyle O'Reilly—

> Organized pharisees, strident and spliced,
> In the name of a slandered, distorted Christ.

Prohibition and Volsteadism have pushed American Government out of doors and set up a new system of church and state. And what a church and what a state! It is a combination of violence, hypocrisy, and oppression; the Anti-Saloon League is the administration; the ministerial mob, the shrieking sisterhoods, and evangelistic dervishes and crackpates are its mouthpieces and executives; the Ku-Klux Klan is its standing army; and the browbeaten, servile courts its obedient servants. Is it not an inspiring picture for us, my brethren? A glorious reward for the befooled millions who hazarded health and life in Europe to save democracy abroad while it was being strangled at home!

The United States to-day looks like a bad copy of Mexico; the America of George Washington has ceased to function; the Goddess of Liberty has been degraded into a drab in the gutters; and the soul and conscience of the land sleep as if with opium drugged.

Here in Washington, in the shadow of this stately Capitol, housing a host of shivering misrepresentatives of the people, the old, tyrannical machinery of discredited monarchy—the court of star chamber—is restored and an ancient infamy has been revived, that Governments can do no wrong and that juries which refuse to obey its behests and make indictment and conviction synonymous are guilty of crime and the fit targets for judicial anger and castigation.

A few weeks ago two men were haled to the police court to be charged with violation of the Volstead law, after their own rights under the Constitution had been invaded. A jury of 10 men and 2 women, all persons of character and repute, deemed the charges weak and strained, and within 5 minutes acquitted the two victims of Volsteadism. The judge, one Schuldt, expressed angry astonishment at the verdict and ordered the foreman to repeat it. Then and there he summarily discharged the jury from further duty, as a warning to all and several that insult and humiliation were to be the portion of those who did not bend the knee to Volstead and the Black Hand agencies of Anti-Saloon League government.

In the year of grace 1554, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton fell into disfavor with the Crown and was brought to trial, charged with vague contempts, and the jury that acquitted him was promptly imprisoned and injuriously fined for their strange independence, for the Crown of that age, like the Anti-Saloon League of this, was above the law and could do no wrong, and held that conviction must follow indictment. It took war, rebellion, revolution, and the decapitation and dethronement of kings to cure England of that evil. Are we to pay the same price to rid America of prohibition, the Anti-Saloon League, and government by lawlessness and judicial terrorism?

I have no hesitation in calling for the removal of this Judge Schuldt, another Jeffreys come to judgment, who should be swiftly and summarily displaced from the bench of a court, in which he would attempt to set up a star chamber in the very heart of the Republic. Judge Schuldt and his peculiar activities are part and parcel of the outrages and infamies growing out of the evils of prohibition and Volsteadism.

We of this House have a duty and responsibility that calls to us insistently. Let us answer the call before it is too late. Remember, please, my warning! [Applause.]

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. I want to know, after listening to the able speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, wherein he said the enforcement of prohibition from Niagara Falls to the Gulf of Mexico had been somewhat watered, whether he still believes the old saying, "Water, water everywhere, but not a drop to drink?"

Mr. GALLIVAN. Of course, I believe in it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. All of the raids that are made by Government officials, gathered from all parts of the United States, are made in Louisiana, while the northern ports are left free.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall speak upon prohibition as incorporated in the eighteenth amendment and interpreted in the Volstead Act. It is almost as difficult to have an intelligent discussion of the question of modifying the Volstead Act with the defenders of that law as it is to have an intelligent discussion of the tariff with a high protectionist. Anyone who advocates any change in that sacred Volstead statute is immediately accused of wanting to revive the saloon, flood the country with whisky, promote drunkenness, and nullify the Constitution. He is classified with bootleggers, the lawless element, and other enemies of society, just as the person who suggests that there should be a reduction of the extortionate duties of the tariff schedule is at once branded as a free trader and accused of wanting to destroy the whole tariff system.

Such have been the methods of intolerance from the dark ages of the past to the present time in which traces of darkness still remain.

LIGHT WINES AND BEER

We who are trying to bring about a modification of the Volstead Act to enable us to have light wines and beer do not belong in any such classifications, and we are not trying to do any of those things we are accused of wanting to do, nor are we inspired by any of the sordid or evil motives we are supposed to have. Certainly we can not be classified with the bootleggers or the lawless element because the modification of the Volstead Act, which would permit the use of light wines and beer of a nonintoxicating content, would put most of the bootleggers out of business and set up a formidable lawful competitor for those who continued in the law-defying business. It would reduce the amount of technical lawlessness generally in a large degree by enabling persons to obtain wholesome beverages lawfully, who now purchase poisonous decoctions unlawfully.

We do not favor modification because we want liquor or the unrestricted use of it. There are many men and women who favor modification who do not use liquor or wines or beer. Having had seven years' experience under the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, we know that the existing laws do not prohibit; we have had fresh experience that morals are not the result of legislation, but that legislation without moral sanction is productive if immorality, lawlessness, and sometimes the extremes in crime.

TRUE TEMPERANCE

We favor modification primarily because we wish to correct as far as possible the evils which have been the outgrowth of the present law and to establish true temperance as the most obvious and effective means of undoing the harm wrought by Volsteadism. We are not asking for intoxicating liquors unless some system can be devised for its governmental control. We favor the establishment of an alcoholic content that competent judges would declare to be nonintoxicating. We do not wish this alcoholic content fixed by persons to whom the mere smell of bay rum would be equivalent to a debauch. We hope in time even to convince some of our so-called dry brethren of the wisdom of this course, and we base our hope upon the current report that some of them are expert in determining intoxicating contents.

Seriously, gentlemen, it is long past the time for the soberminded people of this country to consider the evils that have grown out of the prohibition laws and the conditions resulting therefrom that threaten the very fundamentals of our system of government. The alarming growth of crime in the last seven years is already receiving consideration by criminologists, publicists, and leaders of public thought. It is not necessary to cite many statistics; the fact that crime is rampant in many sections of the country is a notorious fact. Events are more convincing than figures. It is the result of many causes, but one of the chief causes is the outgrowth of prohibition legislation. It is only necessary to cite the murders and robberies by the bootleggers and hijackers in congested cities.

I am not speaking of the technical "crime" of violation of the Volstead Act, but of the major crimes committed by some elements of the violators. There is the long list of varied and frequently unusual crimes committed by the victims of the poisonous decoctions sold as whisky, gin, and other alleged distilled spirits. There are the thefts, burglaries, and similar crimes committed to get money wherewith to purchase liquors at exorbitant prices. The crime of perjury in trials for violations of the prohibition laws is becoming as common as ordinary lying, both on the part of the defense and the prosecution. It is no longer uncommon to read of cases where prohibition agents have deliberately framed a victim and perjured themselves to convict him.

PRESENT CONSUMPTION OF LIQUORS

The people of this country have no idea as to how much liquor is being consumed. It is, of course, very difficult to ascertain, but the World's Almanac estimates that there are 285,206,000 gallons of spirits alone consumed at a total cost of $2,854,160,000. Homemade wine, 75,000,000 gallons at a valuation of $300,000,000.

The Federal Government in 1925 reported the seizure of 17,850 illicit stills, and General Andrews estimated this was only about 1 in 10, or a total of 178,450 stills, all of which are pouring into the liquor traffic millions of gallons which can not be estimated.

In 1917 the number of gallons of domestic wine consumed was 37,640,000 gallons, but since that there has grown up a tremendous manufacture of wine from flowers, fruits, and berries in addition to the grape crops of California, which increased from 26,974 cars in 1920 to 72,255 cars in 1925, and has continued to increase at the same ratio up to the present.

It has been reported by the Government authorities that the rum row has been broken up by the Coast Guard since the 12-mile limit was established, but that this has merely diverted the production to the borders of Canada, Mexico, and the alley distillers of this country.

I merely mention these figures to show that there are so many sources of liquor that it is a matter of impossibility to enforce the present Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment as construed therein.

GRAFT, BRIBERY, AND CORRUPTION

Prohibition enforcement from the beginning has been characterized by graft, bribery, and other forms of corruption. This was inevitable from the very nature of the work to be done. Bootlegging offered a field of operation more profitable than almost any other form of lawlessness. To the enforcement officer the prohibition law itself was the negation of that plea in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." Every one of them was subject to temptation at all times. The agent with a small salary was daily confronted with the opportunity to add largely to his income and sometimes to acquire wealth by looking the other way, or as has frequently happened by actually guiding and protecting the cargo of the bootlegger. Human nature is the same the world over. The greatest foe of the naturally honest man is temptation; if he escapes it, he will remain honest; if he has the strength of character to resist it, he will likewise remain honest. Otherwise he succumbs. The naturally dishonest man who sees the opportunity for graft goes out in search of the tempter.

PROFITS IN DIVERTED ALCOHOL

Doctor Doran estimates that out of a manufacture of 60,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol, 6,000,000 gallons were diverted, or, in other words, went into the drink trade.

This industrial alcohol sold for $3,200—at 32 cents a gallon in a 10,000-gallon tank car, or 40,000 quarts. A tank car would produce 80,000 quarts of gin or 120,000 quarts of whisky, which sells readily at $6 to $10 a quart. Take $6 for 120,000 quarts of liquor, brings the enormous sum of $720,000 to the bootlegging public. If 10,000 gallons produces that sum, then what will 6,000,000 gallons produce in profits?

How can you expect to prevent the manufacture and sale of whisky or gin which brings such tremendous profits with very little expenditure?

The prohibition agent, too, must be differently classified from the officer enforcing laws that have moral sanction behind them. A prohibition agent is as likely to take the same view of the prohibition law as the average man who votes dry and drinks wet. He sees no moral wrong in a violation of the law and is not conscious of committing any crime by permitting others to do it for a consideration. Not even this great lawmaking body can legislate morals any more than it can perform any other miracle.

That graft, bribery, and corruption generally exist in the prohibition-enforcement personnel is a matter of official declaration. Only last September Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman, in Washington dispatches, is quoted as saying:

> There are many incompetent and crooked men in the service. Bribery is rampant. There are many men in sheep's clothing. Some day my arm gets tired signing orders dismissing crooks and incompetents. * * * If America can be made sober and temperate in 50 years, a good job will have been done.

This is the severest rebuke prohibition has received since the passage of the Volstead Act. If Mr. Lowman expects to have complete enforcement in 50 years by changing human nature so that it will be proof against temptation, he will be a sadly disillusioned man if he lives that long. If he expects in that time to arrest and punish all of the people engaged in illicit liquor traffic, he will be equally disillusioned. He may get many of the little fellows, but only occasionally one of the higher of the millionaire class, for bootlegging and rum running now produce their millionaires almost as rapidly as some of our legitimate and lawful industries.

The recent civil-service examinations of the enforcement agents have left the enforcement service in a demoralized and uncertain condition. The public has been led to believe that the Prohibition Unit sought the services of intelligent men as enforcement agents. This idea was long ago dispelled by the repeated violation of the law by the agents themselves, violations which extended to the bill of rights itself and included crimes of homicide and capital offenses. These were excused by the prohibitionists as the few exceptions. The remainder of the force was alleged to be not only men of some character but of high intelligence, but the civil-service examinations referred to show that 75 per cent failed on an intelligence test.

DRUNKENNESS INCREASES

In the meantime crimes continue to increase; arrests for drunkenness continue to increase. Take for example the fact that drunkenness increased almost as fast in 1926 as it did in 1925, and somewhat faster than it did in 1924. In the 602 places reporting, arrests for drunkenness increased from 650,961 in 1924 to 687,812 in 1925 and to 711,889 in 1926.

In the 534 places, arrests for drunkenness in 1926 increased 136 per cent above 1920—the first year of national prohibition.

In the 403 places reporting from 1914 to 1926 arrests for drunkenness in 1926 were higher than in any previous year, save only the war-boom peak of 1916. The 1916 peak was 563,792 arrests for drunkenness, and 1926 almost reached it, being 559,074.

Conditions in the former so-called dry States are very much worse to-day, compared with 1914, than are conditions in the so-called wet States. In the dry States the number of arrests for drunkenness went up rather sharply in 1926, and exceeded any year heretofore; whereas in the former wet States 1926 slightly exceeded the 1914 level, but did not quite reach the 1916–17 peak. The following table shows drunkenness in various large cities:

[1] New York, Newark, Milwaukee, and Portland: This includes arrests for drunkenness, alcoholic casualties, drunk and disorderly and operating vehicles while intoxicated.

[2] Buffalo: When persons are found intoxicated but not disorderly, the officer is directed to take them home instead of arresting them. This accounts for the great reduction.

General disrespect for law continues to increase, and the most outrageous and pitiful fact of all is that the morals of the youth of the land of both sexes are being undermined and impaired by the temptations and opportunities growing out of prohibition. Only a short time ago a social club was raided in Chicago and more than 100 boys and girls of little more than high-school age were found in a state of intoxication. This incident alone ought to be enough to shock the moral sensibilities of the Nation—at least the fathers and mothers—but it is only an extreme instance of what is becoming a more or less common occurrence.

One of the major reasons given by the proponents of prohibition was the protection of the morals of the young; they were never to know the taste of liquors of any kind, but in all the days of preprohibition I do not remember ever to have read of any such orgy among the young as the Chicago affair, and yet, as the press tells us from time to time, delinquency of the same sort is found at many places where youths congregate socially.

STATE RIGHTS AND LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT INVADED

The inroads which prohibition laws, enforcement, and malenforcement are making on local self-government are appalling and should be the concern of serious people who still retain an affection for our system of government and its traditions of civil liberty and the rights of individuals. To-day we find that prohibition regulations written by persons with no legislative mandate are rapidly supplanting the bill of rights; they are taking the place, too, of the common law which we inherited and of which we once boasted; the constitutional guaranty of security in the homes and of persons and papers is constantly violated by unlawful searches and seizures. In most of the States the citizens are in double jeopardy if they violate the Volstead Act despite the Constitution; due process of law is no longer a sure constitutional protection against liberty or property; trial by injunction and padlock is supplanting trial by jury; in fact, trial by jury in prohibition cases is becoming negligible as compared with other procedures. In 1927 there were 31,717 convictions in criminal cases under the national prohibition act, and of these only 3,747 were trials by jury.

If no one is concerned about these encroachments upon our system of self-government, including the impairment of the rights of the States, they can not be expected to become aroused over the increasing toll of death from the poisonous decoctions now being sold under the names of various liquors.

POISON LIQUOR

On cross-examining Doctor Doran December 18 and 19, 1924, before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator JAMES A. REED, of Missouri, asked the following question:

Do you not think that it is a very wicked thing, when you know that 10 per cent of your products are getting out to the people, to put in poison or substances that are so subtle that people will drink them without knowing and destroy their health and life? Do you not think that it is about the nearest approach to murder that a man can commit? * * * You put the poison in it, and you know that 1 drop out of every 10 is going to be drunk by some human being * * *. You gentlemen are officers of the law, paid by the public, and you tell me that you take 60,000,000 gallons of alcohol and render it poisonous and of the 60,000,000 gallons, 6,000,000 gallons are going to be drunk by human beings, the effect being deleterious in some instances and poisonous in others. * * * Now, even if this unfortunate creature who drinks knows that he is getting it from a bootlegger, are not you after all doing something that can not be justified in morals or anything else? * * * I think you are poisoning the American people. I think it is wicked; I think it is infamous; I think it is damnable. And I want to know if there is not some way that you can enforce this prohibitory law without enforcing it by poison?

To which Doctor Doran replied:

Not under the present laws.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Maryland like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]—one of his "wet" associates—in favor of supporting Doctor Doran in enforcing the law? I am asking the gentleman because the gentleman is the official "wet" leader here in the House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not hesitate about answering the gentleman. I am in favor of Doctor Doran enforcing the law in a humane way. It is a part of the Constitution.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman is going to support him in law enforcement, like the gentleman from Massachusetts said he was going to do?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I intend to support his appropriations in this bill because I want him to have every chance to enforce the law. Then when he does not do it, and when he can not do it, as I know, will the gentleman from Texas follow me in amending the law and modifying it so that we may have light wines and beer?

Mr. DEAL. Let him enforce the law legally.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I say so.

Mr. BLANTON. The reason the gentleman can not modify the law is because the gentleman is speaking to about 27 Congressmen here and practically all of them are dry. The gentleman can not make much headway, unless he can get in here his "wets" and talk to them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I will get the speech to the "wets." Perhaps I can talk to them in that way. They are already converted. What I need now is the cooperation of the so-called "drys."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman knows that the meager appropriations in this bill can not even commence to enforce the prohibition law in the United States.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think it was General Andrews who said it would take around $500,000,000 to enforce it in the gentleman's State alone, New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman and myself and every one of the so-called "wets" will vote for the $500,000,000 if they want that amount to attempt to enforce it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; give them every chance to enforce it so long as they do not bankrupt the United States Treasury, and when they find they can not enforce it let us have a modification of it by providing for light wines and beer and for the regulation of the sale of strong drink, like the Quebec plan, for instance.

Mr. BLANTON. But this position has been taken after the "wets" tried to knock out the appropriation in the bill at one time in support of the St. George Tucker amendment, which got but few votes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not so at all, and the gentleman knows it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman himself may not have voted for it. I am talking about the position of the "wets" here. They tried to knock the appropriation out of the bill and they failed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows I did not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. I said the "wets." The gentleman is a "semidry."

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand the policy of my friend from Maryland and my friend from New York, it is this: Give the department all the money it wants to enforce the law and advise everybody to violate it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not so, and the gentleman knows it is not.

Mr. DENISON. Is not that the position of the gentleman?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows very well that the gentleman from New York never made any such statement.

Mr. BLANTON. It takes two "wets" to answer the "dry" gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Statistics for 1926, showing a startling increase in the death rate from alcoholism and from cirrhosis of the liver, a disease attributed to alcohol, have just been made public. Not only do they indicate the constantly increasing use of liquor under the Volstead Act, but they indicate an increasing one of poisoned liquor. The figures obtained from the United States Bureau of the Census show that in virtually every State, whether called "wet" or "dry," the death rate has been mounting, and that the highest rate in the United States was in the State of Wyoming, which has consistently voted "dry." This State was not in the reporting area when the law went into effect in 1920, but between 1922 and 1926, inclusive, its death rate from these causes had risen nearly 200 per cent and now stands at 8.9 per 100,000.

Between 1914 and the taking effect of the Volstead Act, January 17, 1920, there had been a steady decrease in the number of deaths from alcoholism until the rate then stood at 1 per 100,000. In 1926, the last available figures just made public, it had risen to 3.9 per 100,000, or practically four times greater. In 1920 the rate of deaths from cirrhosis of the liver was 6.2; in the figures for 1926, just made public, it was 7.5.

The seriousness of this subject was recognized by the conference of State health officers which met in Washington last May, and it was proposed that a commission of experts be named to study conditions from the standpoint of public health, but the United States Public Health Service, which is a bureau in the Treasury Department, which in turn is responsible for prohibition enforcement, opposed it and it was not adopted.

That the statistics of the Census Bureau are approximately correct—if any deviation, they are probably below the real figures—is shown by the report of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., giving the mortality from alcoholism among its policyholders as 4.1 per 100,000 for 1926, an increase from 3.2 in 1924. As probably four-fifths of the policyholders of the Metropolitan Life are among the industrial classes, this heavy increase in the death rate of workingmen insured in this company is another justification of the labor unions in advocating a modification of the Volstead Act so that the workingman can substitute healthful pure beer for the alcoholic beverages now sold under various designations which is increasing his death rate from alcohol poisoning and cirrhosis of the liver.

It is a serious count in the indictment against the Volstead Act when 11,700 persons die from these causes in one year.

NOT ADOPTED BY A MAJORITY

There is a widespread belief due to false and misleading propaganda that the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act were adopted and enacted by the will of the people. This is easily disproved by the record.

When the eighteenth amendment was declared ratified, there were but six States which were bone dry by popular vote—Arizona, Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Utah, and Washington having 4.2 per cent of the population. There were also six bone-dry States by act of the legislature, which is not always expressive of the will of the people. There were Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Kansas, Nebraska, and South Dakota, having 7.6 per cent of the total population. This total of 12 bone-dry States, with 11.8 per cent of the total population, all became bone dry after the beginning of the World War in 1914.

At the time of the ratification of the eighteenth amendment, there were 18 States with state-wide restrictions, but with means of obtaining alcoholic beverages lawfully—Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, having 32.5 per cent of the population.

The remaining 18 States had no state-wide "dry" law, and would therefore be classified as "wet" by extreme prohibitionists. I would prefer to call them free States. They were California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, Wisconsin, and Wyoming, having 55.7 per cent of the total population.

If the people of these 18 States with more than half the total population of the United States had wanted "bone-dry prohibition" they had the means at hand to enact a state-wide prohibition law, and the fact that they did not do so is the best evidence there is that they did not want it. Two of these last-named States—Connecticut and Rhode Island—have never ratified the eighteenth amendment, and two others—New York and Maryland—with two restricted States—Nevada and New Mexico—and one original bone-dry State—Montana—have no State enforcement acts to this day, be it said to their credit and not their shame, for they are thoroughly in accord with the Constitution of the United States and their own fundamental law which forbids double jeopardy, however the Federal Constitution may be construed by the Supreme Court upholding punishment by the State and Federal Government for the same offense.

There is good reason to believe that a change is taking place. The Anti-Saloon League sees it coming, and for that reason as well as to hold on to good jobs it is asking $2,000,000 a year for five years to educate the next generation. They fear that the coming generation may wipe the prohibition laws off the statutes.

So the league, if not the greatest of our three major political parties, is often the most successful in the matter of legislation, is organizing its new campaign, passing the hat to some, and levying its political assessments on others. It is asking a campaign fund annually twice as large as the Democratic National Committee spent in the last presidential compaign. However successful it may be in raising funds, it can never hope to equal the Republican National Committee.

The league is right in assuming that the coming generation of voters are growing more and more antagonistic to the Volstead Act and the conditions it creates. But the present generation is also undergoing a change of sentiment and among these are the law-abiding people, men and women who, in the belief that the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act would lessen crime and improve public morals and health, ardently supported them. These good people who for conscientious reasons are prohibitionists in practice and in urging respect for the prohibition law are undergoing a change of sentiment because they have seen the results to be the reverse of what they had hoped and expected.

VOLSTEADISM IMPOSED BY ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE

The prohibition laws were imposed upon the Nation by the Anti-Saloon League and its kindred organizations. Some of the methods by which this was done were revealed at the recent hearings of the special Senate committee investigating senatorial elections of which Senator JAMES A. REED, of Missouri, was chairman.

At that hearing Senator REED brought out the statement from Wayne B. Wheeler that the league had expended the enormous sum of $35,000,000 in its efforts to secure the passage and ratification of the eighteenth amendment and the passage of the Volstead Act; that in the three years prior to the adoption of national prohibition the league had spent at the rate of $2,500,000 a year. These expenditures make the sum spent by Smith and VARE in the elections then under investigation and the amount spent by Newberry in 1918 seem insignificant. The Senate has condemned the expenditures in the Newberry and Smith cases as "contrary to sound policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government."

The comparison is obvious: The expenditures of the Anti-Saloon League have been contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Nation; harmful alike to public health and public morality, to official honesty, to the unalienable rights of citizens, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government.

But the expenditures of enormous sums of money constitute only one of the major offenses of the league in political campaigns. For a long time it made no report of its expenditures under the national publicity act, and when it was compelled to render a report it rendered only a partial one, saying:

> We respectfully protest that there is no obligation on the part of the Anti-Saloon League of America to make this report as its activities are of an educational, scientific, and charitable character, rather than a political one. We, therefore, while protesting, refer only to the contributions made by our national organization for the election of Members of Congress.

Not only by persuasion, which the league had a right to use, has it sought to gain its political ends. It has threatened and bullied politicians and candidates in campaigns, and by the same methods has undertaken to bend State and National legislators to its will. It has at times supported a candidate in the primaries and opposed him in the general election, and its spokesman testified he saw no ethical delinquency in that.

Testimony before the Reed committee also revealed the fact that the league has sought to control the appointments of prohibition high officials and enforcement agents by the usual methods of recommending them, which under its well-known method of operation meant trouble for the appointing power if the recommendation were not heeded. It has at some periods been the general understanding that only men who had the indorsement of the league could get a job in the old Prohibition Unit, and when one of the high officials of that unit had signally failed to enforce the law through the objectionable methods then employed, the league made a persistent and determined fight to keep this pet of the organization in his job.

From beginning to end the operations of the league have been political, and it has frequently employed methods that have long since been discarded by professional politicians other than the old school who operated on the motto of "the end justified the means."

As collateral evidence, let me quote from a recent editorial in the New York Times:

> The evil fruits of enforcement have turned into enemies multitudes of men and women who at first and for long were resolved to support the law because it is the law. Reluctantly they have had to yield to what has become an overpowering weight of evidence. They see a social and moral recklessness or decadence among many of the young. They see old crime undiminished and the Volstead Act a fertile source of new. They see, besides the little delicacies of spying, informing, violence, and unlawful search and seizure, futility mingled with corruption in the enforcement service.

The time is at hand when some action must be taken. We should look at the question as patriotic American citizens and not assume the attitude of fanatics.

No law which has not the moral support of the people can long endure much less be enforced. As I have said you can not legislate people's morals any more than you can perform other miracles. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YON].

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I was greatly impressed by the actions of the House Thursday, the 9th of February, and although you have in the past talked and voted as if Florida was an outlaw State on account of our constitutional provisions relating to inheritance and income taxes, when you voted and kept the 80 per cent credit clause in the internal revenue act so as to coerce my State, if possible, to repeal her constitution, and also after this, during a discussion of this floor by the able and splendid Member from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] on January 17, in which he took a dig at Florida, in which he referred to an argument between the Member from west Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN], in which he said these gentlemen got into an argument about which would be the best place to go when a man had made his fortune and was through and ready to die, and in stating his preference the gentleman from Mississippi said that if he died in either place it made little difference, because in either place the change would be so great and glorious if he went to heaven that he had come all the way from Florida or Texas, and if he died and went to the wrong place the contrast would be so slight that it would not hurt much, and admitted Texas was a great State, which I admit, but he did not even then admit Florida to be a great State; and with all of this added to your former action in the revenue act, I had come to feel that you were disposed to treat us roughly, but though after your action of agreeing to amendment of my colleague from Florida [Mr. SEARS] in giving to Miami the amount due her out of the recent military appropriation bill and the splendid spirit shown to a community that had undergone a series of misfortunes, the latest a series of bank disturbances, caused by the circulation of a damaging falsehood. I am aware that this money is due Miami, but not all due as per contract with Government at this time, but they need it now, and, as I said at the outset, I appreciate this on behalf of the people of my State; and with all the backsets, Florida as a whole and Miami in particular both are all right, and with the sentiment as expressed in the following editorial from the Washington Post of last week that I read, as follows:

Since early in 1926, when the Florida boom burst with a resounding thud, its banks have been steering a cautious and conservative course. In most quarters it is believed that financial conditions in Florida now are thoroughly satisfactory and that the present flare up in which three banks have been taken over by the State comptroller and another has experienced an incipient run is not of particular significance. Trouble apparently was stirred up by an anonymous individual who, under the signature "Hiram," circulated letters counseling withdrawal of deposits. Investigation of the source of these letters is under way, but as yet the writer has not been identified.

The banks involved are the Southern Bank & Trust Co., taken over by the State comptroller at the request of its officers, and against which the anonymous letters were directed; the Citizens Bank of Miami, and the Bank of Allapattah, taken over to prevent them from being subjected to an unnecessary strain because of the possibility that a run would develop and not because either was unsafe in its present condition. The run developed against the First National Bank of Miami after the other banks had been taken over. The latter institution was able to meet all demands for payment.

In every quarter it is agreed that as soon as public confidence is restored the critical period will have passed. Florida banks have on call in New York millions of dollars. They have taken to heart the lessons learned in the boom period and have been leaning backward during the past year or so in the matter of loans. Fundamentally Florida stands to-day more sound than ever before. The State is destined to play an important rôle in the future not only as a national playground but also as the truck garden of the eastern seaboard.

In the meantime no effort should be spared in running to earth the individual responsible for the poison-pen letters. With banking so dependent upon public confidence, the person who willfully sets out to destroy confidence perpetrates an atrocious commercial crime.

Throughout the country, in the minds of the people, the country will recognize Florida's true significance in the destiny of the Nation, and again I certainly thank you for your splendid spirit shown my colleague and also my State. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to talk for a little while about a very ancient subject, and I am not going to undertake discussion of it in any controversial or in a particularly partisan spirit. The matter, by reason of legislative development, has reached the stage where it is apparent, to my mind, that it is constantly becoming a matter of acute concern to the people of this country. That is the question of the revision of the tariff.

When this Congress convened it was given out and generally expected that there would be some items of major legislation in the program of Congress—flood control, farm relief, Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, consolidated railroad systems, and a few other matters of outstanding importance—but the question of a revision of the tariff system of our country was not particularly mentioned as one of the things that would be expected to be the subject of legislation in this long session of Congress.

But it is apparent, to my mind, from reading the debates in the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, in seeking a solution for some of the other problems that we have in mind—that of farm relief and unemployment—that the question of tariff has been constantly pushed forward as a matter of grave consideration.

Not very long ago in the Senate of the United States a resolution on this question was introduced—and, mark you, gentlemen, it was not sponsored by a Democratic organization of that body nor by a group of Democrats in that body, but, significantly, was offered by a representative in another branch of Congress of a sovereign State, who at least nominally is a Republican in good standing.

After long and thorough, painstaking debate upon the importance of that question as it now affects agriculture, industry, and commerce, not sectionally but the entire country, a resolution was adopted speaking the sentiment of a very large majority of the representatives of the people in the other legislative branch of the Government in this language:

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive, and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such excessive rates, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all.

Resolved further, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Recognizing the constitutional limitations upon the powers of that body to originate revenue legislation, it concluded with the further resolution—

That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

What is the real significance of that proposal? Is it a matter that the Congress of the United States can treat lightly? Is a matter that must be lightly pushed aside by we men who are here in both branches of our Government seeking, if we can find it, some safe and sane solution for the depressed condition of our agricultural affairs in America? Shall we say that that is a mere gesture and that it means nothing? Bear in mind that not only the Democrats in the other body voted for that resolution but that some 14 representatives of the great western group of States—Messrs. BORAH, BROOKHART, CAPPER, SHIPSTEAD, NORRIS, HOWELL, FRAZIER, NYE, NORBECK, MCMASTER, LA FOLLETTE, BLAINE, and PINE voted for the resolution. Did they mean anything by their votes?

Were they conscious of the necessities of their people for agricultural relief? Did they, contrary to the traditional policy of their party, recognize the importance of some action of that sort being taken, to the extent that they so voted, reflecting, as they no doubt did, what, in their judgment, is best for the interest of the great States and sections that they represented—that there should be a revision downward of some of the excessive rates, and by implication ask the House of Representatives to take some action upon it? Let us see what their Republican colleagues on the floor of this House did on that proposition. From the State of Idaho we find that Messrs. SMITH and FRENCH voted against the resolution. From the State of Iowa we find that Messrs. GREEN, DICKINSON, KOPP, LETTS, ROBINSON, HAUGEN, COLE, RAMSEYER, DOWELL, and THURSTON voted against it. I was particularly surprised that the one-time so-called leader of the farm bloc in this House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], when this opportunity was presented to him to express the views of his people on the question, if they were properly interpreted in the other body, voted against the only proposal which made it possible at this session of Congress to go into this question of undertaking to find some relief for agriculture through reducing downward the excessive industrial schedules of the present law. I have heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] stand here time after time warning his Republican associates from the East and from New England that unless they gave relief in the nature of the McNary-Haugen bill his Republican associates from his section of the country would see to it that the high-protective tariff wall should be torn down to some extent and give relief to agriculture in that way. From the State of Kansas we find that Messrs. GUYER, SPROUL, HOCH, STRONG, and WHITE voted against the resolution, although a distinguished representative of that great State in another body, who is supposed to be one of the spokesmen of the agricultural interests of the West, said by his vote that he thought this to be an imperative proposition at this session of Congress.

From Minnesota we find that Messrs. FURLOW, ANDRESEN, MAAS, NEWTON, KNUTSON, and SELVIG voted against the resolution. Then we find that Messrs. SEARS and SIMMONS from the State of Nebraska, which is the State of one of the greatest intellects in the Senate of the United States, in my opinion, voted against it. In the State of North Dakota we find that Messrs. BURTNESS and HALL, and in South Dakota Mr. WILLIAMSON, and in Wisconsin Mr. COOPER, and in Oklahoma Mr. GARBER voted against the resolution. My concern is to know which group of representative thought in the Congress of the United States really represents the interest of agriculture on this question of tariff revision, the Representatives on this floor or those who represent the sovereignty of their people in another body. Which is reflecting the real views of their constituents on this vital problem?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What does the gentleman from Alabama think on the question of whether as a general rule the Members of this body from a particular State represent the views of the people of that State about as well as the representatives of that State in the Senate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to the gentleman's question I would say that naturally I am inclined to think that probably we in this body better represent those views.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. At least we hope so; but, as I say, it presents to an inquiring mind an interesting political dilemma—as to whether our colleagues here under the Republican flag represent the real views of their agricultural constituents upon this question, or do those in another body represent them?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] made a speech here a few days ago in which he said that industry was depressed in his section of the country because the tariff rates are not high enough to protect some of the industries located in that section, upon which the prosperity of that people depended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that we find a representative of that particular school of thought, and I pay the compliment to Mr. CROWTHER to say that he is always sincere and that he never makes any apologies for his high-protection views—we find a representative of a great industrial State in the East solemnly proclaiming to the country that we need a revision upward of the tariff schedules as they affect industry, and he says that we ought to have them, but that we ought not to have them now because that group of thought has not an actual majority in both branches of the Congress, and that he and his group are not willing to take any chances upon it until they are absolutely assured by some new elections that they hold the legislative reins and can impose their will and view upon these questions upon the people of the United States.

On the contrary, gentlemen, we find representatives of a great group of agriculturalists saying that agriculture and its interests are prostrated and suffering and in peril because of the inequality of these tariff rates. The rates are too high for the things that they have to buy. Therefore they are not upon terms of equality with other people in the country.

Gentlemen, this question, in my mind, although as I said it was not on the program here of the activities to be carried out by this Congress, and although by your action the other day in refusing even to give the Committee on Ways and Means a tacit instruction to consider this question—my opinion, because of the very factors I have enumerated here, is that the question of tariff revision is and will be in my opinion in the coming congressional and national election one of the paramount issues of this campaign. There are so many conflicting views upon it from our friends on the Republican side that we do not know where they stand on it. It is illustrated by a story related of Senator Taylor of Tennessee in one of his campaigns. Perhaps some questions of fact are involved, but the story illustrates what I am speaking about. It was during a heated controversy over the free-silver question. There were wide differences of opinion on that question in Tennessee. The story runs that Senator Taylor, who was a candidate for office at that time and making a campaign, was going to speak in a section of east Tennessee where he was not quite sure of the sentiment of the people on the silver question, and he naturally thought he would side-step a little on that question.

At any rate, while he was holding forth on other questions an old fellow sitting on the back benches said, "Well, Senator, we would like to hear from you on the money question. What do you think of it?" The Senator talked of other questions, meanwhile thinking of what he might say in answer to the old man, and presently the old fellow interrupted him again and said, "Senator, how do you stand on it?" Finally the Senator said, "My friend has asked me a frank question and is entitled to a frank answer. He asks me how I stand on the money question, and I am going to tell him very frankly. I believe," he said, "in the gold standard. I also believe in the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the rate of 16 to 1 without the consent of any other nation on earth. I also believe in a very liberal use of greenback currency, and a right smart little sprinkling of counterfeits." [Laughter.]

On this question of the tariff, as reflected by the views and attitudes and votes of Members who are supposed to represent the Republican faith on this question, never in my experience have I seen so many counterfeit views on the tariff question as have been brought forth at this session. [Applause.]

The truth of the matter is that if the Republicans in this House from the agricultural West would join with the Democrats in an earnest and determined effort, we could revise the tariff at this session in such fashion that the "excessive" tariff schedules mentioned in the McMaster Senate resolution could be revised downward, and where additional protection is justified on farm products, that also could likely be secured.

On this suggestion I call the attention of you Republican farm-section Representatives to the bill recently introduced by Hon. WILLIAM A. AYRES, Democrat, of Kansas—H. R. 10758. He proposes a reduced tariff on a great many articles of necessity which the farmer has to buy, the rates upon which are now "excessive," and also proposes to raise the tariff on many products and by-products of the farm, which many of you claim should be raised to protect properly American agriculture, such as cattle, sheep, swine, meats, hides, milk, butter, eggs, poultry, corn, oats, wheat, rice, onions, and potatoes.

If you Republican Members from the West would get up enough courage to demand of your Ways and Means Committee consideration of and action upon the Ayres bill as a basis of tariff revision you could get it. But if you merely continue to make idle threats and allow the eastern manufacturers to dominate the situation, you will go nowhere and get nothing.

In the meantime your people back home will bear the burden and "pay the freight." Possibly they deserve that penalty for continuing to send here Representatives who talk one way and vote another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] was discussing the question of economy this afternoon he made the statement that the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal was hardly in harmony with the policy of economy which has been proclaimed by the present administration, and during that statement he and I engaged in a little colloquy on the question of who purchased the Cape Cod Canal.

I have looked the matter up—the gentleman from Tennessee and I have done so together—and I find that this matter of the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal first came up in April in the year 1917, when the Senator from Delaware, Mr. Saulsbury, in charge of the naval appropriations bill, inserted a provision in the bill authorizing negotiations for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal. The Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, addressed a letter to Senator Saulsbury, in which he said that it would be agreeable to the administration to insert an amendment in the naval appropriation bill looking to the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal, and following that the appropriation bill was passed, and there was inserted in it this provision:

> Waterway connecting Buzzards Bay and Cape Cod, Mass.: The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby authorized to examine and appraise the value of the works and franchises of the Cape Cod Canal, Mass., connecting Buzzards and Cape Cod Bays, with reference to the advisability of the purchase of said canal by the United States and the construction over the route of the said canal of a free waterway, with or without a guard lock, and having a depth and capacity sufficient to accommodate the navigation interests that are affected thereby. This investigation shall be conducted under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers in the usual manner provided by law for making preliminary examinations and surveys, except that the Secretary of War shall call upon the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce for such data and evidence as these Secretaries may wish to have incorporated in the report of survey, and, further, that the final report of the investigation, with its conclusions upon probable cost and commercial advantages, and military and naval uses of the said canal, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce for their action before it is transmitted to Congress.
> If the said Secretaries are all in favor of the acquisition of the said canal the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to enter into negotiations for its purchase, including all property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and he is further authorized, if in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce, that the price for such canal is reasonable and satisfactory, to make contracts for the purchase of the same, at the option of the United States, subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress; or, in the event of the inability of the Secretary of War to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said Cape Cod Canal and its appurtenances, he is hereby authorized and directed, through the Attorney General, to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to, the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, substantially as provided in "An act to authorize condemnation of land sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved August 1, 1888; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith. The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to report the proceedings hereunder to Congress, $5,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman stated that that item appeared in an appropriation bill, and authorized the Secretary of War and his colleagues in the Cabinet to make an investigation and a contract, but their action was not to be final. They only had authority to report to Congress, and it was necessary for Congress to pass a ratification bill in order to make any purchase agreed upon valid.

Mr. DENISON. Certainly. They could not pay the money or close the deal until their action was ratified by Congress.

Mr. BYRNS. Therefore it was not an authorization so far as any appropriation was concerned, but simply an authorization to make an investigation.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. I think the difference between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself grew out of the interpretation of the word "authorization." I was talking about the authorization of the purchase, and the gentleman from Tennessee evidently had in mind the authorization of the appropriation. Of course, anyone can see that it was the authorization of the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal rather than the authorization of the appropriation to pay for it that is most pertinent to our discussion of the subject of economy. After Congress has authorized the purchase of the property, all of us would agree that we should appropriate the money to pay for it. And the fact is that the former Democratic administration and Democratic Congress authorized the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal.

Mr. BYRNS. But this did not authorize the purchase except upon ratification by Congress.

Mr. DENISON. I have to differ with my friend, because that language is very plain. It authorized the Secretaries to enter into a contract for the purchase of the canal.

Mr. MADDEN. It not only authorized the purchase but it also authorized the entering of suit. Such a suit was entered and a judgment was rendered for $16,000,000. When Mr. Baker went out of office the certificate for the payment of the $16,000,000 was lying on the desk of the Attorney General, and I persuaded him not to sign it, and we finally settled the thing for $11,500,000.

Mr. BYRNS. The point I make is that it was not an authorization to purchase except upon ratification by Congress. The Secretary of War was not given the right to purchase and, as a matter of fact, he disapproved it.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the Secretary of War did not have the money with which to make the purchase. He had to bring it back here and have the appropriation authorized by Congress. But this language is plain. Congress authorized the Secretaries to enter into negotiations and make a contract for the purchase of the canal, and if they could not make a satisfactory contract to purchase it they were directed to use the Attorney General in the condemnation of the property and bring back the award to Congress for its final approval. Following that Secretary Baker addressed a letter to Congress, under date of February 5, 1919, in which he advises Congress of his negotiations. He tells about entering into these negotiations for the purchase of the canal and says:

> In compliance with a further requirement of the act these reports have been given very careful consideration by myself and associates, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce. After mature study of the data presented in the reports and further extended inquiry into the questions of costs and values we reached the conclusion that it was desirable for the Government to buy the canal and that $8,250,000 was a fair and reasonable price to pay for it. I then entered into negotiations with the owners of the canal with a view to contracting for its purchase and offered them the sum of $8,250,000, which offer they declined to accept. Convinced of my inability to make a satisfactory contract to purchase, I have asked the Attorney General to institute proceedings to condemn the canal and its appurtenances as provided in the act.

Following that Secretary Baker instructed the Attorney General to enter upon condemnation proceedings. The Attorney General entered condemnation proceedings in the United States court in Massachusetts. They had a long trial and the jury, I think, awarded $16,000,000, or something like that.

Mr. MADDEN. Sixteen million dollars.

Mr. DENISON. Sixteen million dollars for the canal. It was claimed that there was some error made in the admission of evidence of some kind and the case had to be taken to the court of appeals, and I think that court reversed the judgment of the lower court, not on account of the amount of the award but on account of the admission of some kind of evidence.

At any rate, the negotiations were still pending when the administration changed hands. Then the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of War of the new administration took up the negotiations where the Democratic administration had left off and finally succeeded in making a contract to purchase the canal for $11,500,000, which was something like $4,500,000 less than the jury had awarded as damages for the taking of the canal. That contract, made in pursuance of this direction from Congress under a preceding Democratic administration, was reported back to Congress by the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks. It was pending in Congress for several years. We passed the bill in the House and it went to the Senate, but it failed of passage there because of some sort of a filibuster or for some other reason. Finally the ratification of the contract of purchase was included in the river and harbor bill which Congress passed in 1927 and became a law.

Mr. BYRNS. In order to keep the record straight, the contract was made for $11,500,000?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. That was entered into on July 21, 1921.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; the national administration having changed hands.

Mr. BYRNS. That was $3,000,000 more than Secretary Baker said it was worth, was it not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. DENISON. But later Secretary Baker, on May 28, 1919, addressed a letter to Congress, which I will take the liberty of inserting in the RECORD, because I will not have the time to read it.

In that letter he simply reported to the Congress the proceedings he had taken in trying to carry out the instruction of the Congress. He recites that he tried to purchase it but could not do so for what he thought was a reasonable price. Then he recites that they entered into condemnation proceedings, and finally he advises the Congress that he thought if he were authorized to do so and was given the money he could buy it for $10,000,000. He said he thought he could make them agree to those terms. He says:

> Upon further careful consideration, I am of the opinion that the canal can be acquired for not exceeding $10,000,000, and that it will be sufficient to appropriate this sum. In order that I may be authorized to take immediate possession of the property without waiting for the conclusion of the pending suit in condemnation, I have the honor to recommend that legislation substantially as follows be enacted.

In other words, he recommended that without waiting further, if he were given $10,000,000 and the authority to go ahead and close the contract of purchase, he felt he could do it for that amount. Congress did not do that, but he recommended that he be given $10,000,000 at that time. Several years later Congress ratified the contract which provided for $11,500,000 for the purchase of this canal.

I did not intend to get into this subject but I merely wanted to keep the record straight. The whole proceedings for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal were begun in 1917 under the former Democratic administration. The Secretary of War, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Navy under Mr. Wilson's administration did consider this thing and recommended that the canal be purchased. Proceedings were undertaken to carry that out, and a Democratic Congress authorized it to be done. It instructed them to do it and report back, and the Republicans simply took up the matter where the Democrats had left off and completed what the Democrats did not have time to complete before the people decided the Government ought to be put in other hands.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The only difference being that if Mr. Baker's proposition had been accepted there would have been a saving of $1,500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. When the judgment was rendered by the court, under Mr. Palmer's administration, there were no witnesses put on the stand to testify on behalf of the Government, but on the other side of the case Belmont and his friends, who owned the canal, put on George W. Goethals and others to testify as to the value of the property, and the judgment rendered amounted to $16,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. In that connection I want to say to my friend from Alabama that when we finally agreed to pay $11,500,000 for the canal there was included in its provisions the settlement of claims against the Government amounting to millions of dollars, which resulted from the use and occupation of the canal by the Government during the war. That amount included a lot of damage to the canal resulting from collisions, and so forth, which happened during Federal control. The Government had never compensated the owners of the canal for its use during the period of Federal control. The canal company's claims for compensation for the use of the canal during Federal control, and their other large claims for damages to the canal, were all included in the contract of settlement for $11,500,000. So that while we nominally paid $11,500,000 for the property, that amount of $11,500,000 included the settlement of these millions of dollars worth of claims against the Government accruing under the railroad administration.

I merely wanted to make that statement in the interest of fairness to all the departments of the Government.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does not the whole thing finally narrow itself down to this conclusion? When the Government institutes proceedings to condemn property, it not only should be very careful to put an abundance of witnesses on the stand as to value but it should be very particular in its selection of the jurors. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENISON. Of course, that is true in all kinds of condemnation suits.

But a great many Members of the House, gentlemen, voted for final ratification of this contract and the purchase of this canal because they believed that this prior action of Congress morally committed the Government to the purchase of the canal and that we, in good faith, ought to carry out our obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill yield the gentleman from Illinois one-half minute? I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield the gentleman one-half minute.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Since Secretary Baker made his report on this canal, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a list of all the big stockholders of this company who would be benefited by this act, and did not that change the situation somewhat?

Mr. DENISON. I confess I did not see that and I do not know.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman ought to read that list.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to, I am sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and in connection therewith to put in the names of the owners of stock who benefited by the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. I will object to that.

Mr. BLANTON. Just the names of those who benefited.

Mr. DENISON. I do not object to the gentleman putting in anything he wants, but I do not want it inserted in my remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean for it to be inserted at the end of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. DENISON. I do not object to the gentleman inserting anything he wishes, but not in my remarks.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That was a part of the speech.

Mr. BLANTON. It was a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as per leave granted me, I insert here the names of the stockholders of the Cape Cod Canal Co., who profited by this sale to the Government, such list having been placed in the RECORD by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] on December 21, 1926, and is quoted from page 845 of the RECORD, to wit:

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes.

There does not seem to be any particular or very wide difference between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and myself. My chief point with reference to the Cape Cod Canal was that this stock was unprofitable to those who owned it and absolutely unsalable to anybody except the Government, which paid $11,500,000 for it; and it was freely stated on the floor that in order to put the Cape Cod Canal in condition to operate there would be required many million dollars more; in fact, I recall one distinguished gentleman who made the statement that it would cost between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. To rehabilitate it.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and including the purchase price, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has just confirmed my statement, and he is the gentleman to whom I referred.

No one questions that the point I was endeavoring to make was that this stock was entirely unprofitable to those who owned it and absolutely unsalable to anyone except the Government of the United States. So far as these other facts are concerned, the gentleman from Illinois and I have looked the matter up since the remarks were made and find that on August 8, 1917, there was an act passed by the Congress—which was a Democratic Congress and under a Democratic administration—directing or authorizing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce to make investigations and if they could get proper terms to purchase the Cape Cod Canal, subject, of course, to final ratification and approval by Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. BYRNS. They were not given any authority to make the purchase, and Congress did not give them the jurisdiction or authority to purchase it.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has just shown that they were unable to agree and that Secretary of War Baker reported that in his judgment a proper price was $8,500,000. They refused to accept it. Then, proceeding under the act to which I have referred, he asked the Attorney General to institute condemnation proceedings. These proceedings were had and the jury findings, as stated, were about $16,000,000. I assume that figure is correct.

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, that was not approved by Congress. Then the matter rocked along until July 21, 1921, when the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, of Massachusetts, entered into a contract with the Cape Cod Canal stockholders by which he agreed to give $11,500,000, an increase of $3,000,000 over the amount which Secretary of War Baker thought the stock was properly worth. Of course, Secretary of War Weeks did not make the purchase, because, as I have just said, the act did not authorize him to purchase it, but he entered into that contract.

It was not until January 21, 1927, one year ago, that Congress took action by an amendment on the rivers and harbors bill and authorized an appropriation to be made to pay the stockholders $11,500,000, and later on, as I recall, a deficiency bill carried, I think, $6,000,000 by way of an appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. Five million five hundred thousand dollars. There was $6,000,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. BYRNS. As I have shown, I was absolutely correct in my statement that the authorization act which completed the purchase was enacted within the last two years.

Mr. DENISON. And that was to keep faith with what our Democratic predecessors had done.

Mr. BYRNS. No; because the Democratic Secretary of War said that the property was worth $8,500,000, and according to the gentleman's own statement, in the letter which he says he is going to insert, the Secretary of War stated he thought he could purchase it for $10,000,000; but a contract was made in 1921 under a Republican administratiaon to pay $11,500,000.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; but my friend must remember that that $11,500,000 included the settlement of claims amounting to several million dollars more.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will take about two minutes to explain what I know about this. In the first place, August P. Belmont, treasurer of the National Democratic Committee, from New York, owned what was known as the Cape Cod Canal. I do not know how the negotiations for the sale and purchase began, but they did begin, and the case went to the courts. Mr. Palmer was the Attorney General of the United States at the time. He failed to call witnesses to testify as to the value of the canal for the Government. On the other hand, the Belmont interests did call witnesses, among whom was George W. Goethals, now dead, to testify, and they testified as to the value of the canal, including the 3,000 acres around the canal.

Judgment was rendered as a result for $16,000,000. When Mr. Baker and Mr. Palmer went out of office there was a certificate for the payment of $16,000,000 under the judgment on the desk of the incoming Attorney General waiting for his signature. He came and asked if I knew anything about it. I told him all I knew about it, as I am telling you now. I thought it was not advisable to sign the certificate, because I thought it was an excessive price to pay.

I may say now what I said then, that if the Government bought the canal it would undoubtedly have to spend $25,000,000 more to make it a canal. I say that again.

The incoming Attorney General did not sign the certificate. I think he was being pressed to do so and so was the President. They came to me about it, and asked as to the advisability, and I said, "If you have any doubt about the propriety of the payment of this certificate, tell those people that you can not get by me with it in its present form." They did not press it after that.

I think the case was taken out of court a little later, and further legislation was had on the subject. But the final outcome was that $11,500,000, including the bonds that rested on the property, was to be paid, and we did appropriate $5,500,000 to meet the obligations, aside from the bonds. There was an effort made to appropriate for the bonds, but the Committee on Appropriations refused to do that because the law distinctly says that you can not pay the bonds until after six months notice, nor can you give notice until six months after the title passes, and I do not know that the title has passed yet.

I want to say one thing more, and that is that if we had listened to the importunities of those who were anxious to have payment made, we would have paid $1,500,000 more than has been paid on the accumulated interest which we refused. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and myself were always on guard, and there was not any danger of a thing of that kind getting by us when we were awake, and we were not often asleep. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up much time. My real purpose is to ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in regard to a trip I made through Mexico and Guatemala and my observations of agricultural and other conditions. I want to suggest in regard to clarifying the point that seems to me in dispute here, that some gentleman who can secure the information tell us what revenue the Cape Cod Canal has produced within the last 10 years?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think there has been any.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, some years ago Tomas Garrido, Governor of the State of Tabasco, Mexico, invited Walter Parker, then general manager of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, to select a committee of gentlemen to visit his State to investigate its resources and carry back their observations to those who might find them of interest. Mr. Parker invited gentlemen representing all lines of New Orleans commercial interests to accept the generous invitation of the Governor of Tabasco. As a result of that invitation, Walter Parker, general manager of the Association of Commerce (chairman); JAMES O'CONNOR, Member of Congress for New Orleans; Dr. Brandt V. B. Dixon, president emeritus Newcomb College of Tulane University; Paul Villere, representing the associated banks of New Orleans; A. M. Shaw, consulting engineer; Prof. Charles H. Stromberg, of Louisiana State University; Dr. William Gates, director department of middle-American research, Tulane University; Alan W. Payne, assistant to Doctor Gates; W. W. Allen, manager export department Albert Mackie Co.; J. B. Monteros, of Monteros & Co., exporters; J. C. Whilden, exporter of livestock; J. H. Kurth, manufacturer; and W. A. Burt, lumberman and importer, left New Orleans on board the steamer Atlantida, a Vaccaro vessel.

I might mention at this point that the Vaccaro brothers have been heroes in the strife in endeavoring to build up the port of New Orleans and establish the supremacy of American commerce. They are men from the ground up. Unostentatiously they go through life apparently unaware of the tremendous power they have won as giants in the commercial, financial, and transportation chapters of the country.

I am going to save myself considerable trouble and give you a picturesque and entertaining account of our trip from the facile pen of my brilliant, scholarly, and charming acquaintance, Alan W. Payne. It is more than an account. It is a pen picture. With masterly stroke he brings you along on one of the most romantic journeys I ever had the good fortune to make. Hard days and nights that are unforgetable, and scenes which will live until my memory is no more.

On board of the steamer were Gen. P. E. Calles, the then President elect of Mexico, and his two daughters. This party left the ship at Tampico, where a great ovation was accorded General Calles. The streets were thronged with welcoming people, soldiers, marines, sailors, and the police lined up to make the official welcome. The air rung with the shouts of the populace, who lined the festooned and gorgeously decorated thoroughfares. Huzzas and bravos were the order of the day and were gladly shouted on the sidewalks and in the cafés. Our party regretfully had to leave the festive scene, however, for it was necessary to make Frontera before the next night, as it is difficult to get over the bar there after sundown, even in small steamers which are used as lighters to take the passengers from the larger vessel which has to anchor some distance out from the mouth of the river. This really beautiful river is named the Grijalva, in honor of one of the crew with Columbus on the immortal voyage that resulted in the discovery of America. It is several miles up the river to the town of Frontera, where the party located for a few nights.

Just above this city two great rivers, the Usumacinta and Grijalva, come together, and it seems quite a moot question as how to name the river from there to the seas. The mouth opens to the east, but some years ago a canal, about half a mile long, was dredged to the north, so as to give an entrance from that direction in case of easterly storms. The bar that has formed off these two mouths gives constant trouble, since only vessels of less than 7 feet draft can enter. When this bar can be removed, steamer traffic can go up both rivers for several hundred miles. At present, bananas, lumber, and other exports must be transshipped by means of barges. With the removal of this obstruction a great commercial development, advantageous as much to New Orleans as well as to the country, since this city is the logical market to which the people look, should open up.

VEGETATION LUXURIOUS

After a cordial banquet in the main hotel of the town, situated on a most picturesque plaza, the party was quartered in a beautiful private home near by. On awakening the next morning we were greeted by the calls of brilliant cardinals flitting through the trees of the patio. This garden was the most colorful spot imaginable. Outstanding among the bushes was the glorious Bugainvillæa, with huge clusters of purplish flowers that put to shame the feeble tints of its New Orleans kin. Plants of varicolored leaves; high palms swaying in the breeze; orange and lemon trees; various colorful flowers whose names were as unfamiliar as their forms. In the center a great tamarind tree overspread all, keeping out the glare from a brilliant cloudless sky. And in the background an ancient red tiled roof, green in spots with age, framed in the straight white pillars of the royal palm. Surely, a garden fit for a princess.

During that day several side trips were made. One took us out in the country for a lunch on native products, that those who had never seen the Tropic countries should get an idea of the fields and woods. Another to a sawmill, where great rafts of mahogany trees, brought down many miles from Guatemala and the interior of Tabasco, were trimmed, cut into planks to some degree, and prepared for shipment to New Orleans. On the way, and in fact in many other places, we walked on sidewalks of wide mahogany planks that would have been worth their weight in silver in the States. Yet this wood is as plentiful as pine here, and found used as generally. Later we visited the headquarters of the International Petroleum Co., which has been drilling for oil farther inland for a year or so, and whose officials and field men are confident that oil will be found.

A banquet followed in the evening and a most enjoyable party afterwards, although most of the party had the night before enjoyed dancing until late at a ball given in our honor.

The next day, November 12, the party was taken up the Grijalva River on a "hind-wheeler" steamer, passing through the most verdant country, where banana trees 30 feet and more in height were seen. Birds of all varieties, including the snowy egret, white crane, many parrots, and others unfamiliar were seen in thousands. For nine hours the vessel pushed up this broad river, passing numerous cayucos, or dugout canoes, poled by men standing in bow and stern with great oars that are used both for paddling and poling. Villahermosa, "the Beautiful City," capital of the State, hove in sight long after dark. And after a very sumptuous dinner Governor Garrido received the party, in company with the local chamber of deputies in the city hall.

In his welcoming talk Governor Garrido stressed the desire of the people for peace and voiced their recognition of the need of developing the commerce and resources of the country. The Tabascans, he said, look to the United States for help, and particularly a market. The people have had more than enough of revolution and civil strife and are fully desirous of protecting foreign capital that should be invested for development.

Spokesmen for our party voiced the sentiment that the United States should lend a helping hand, since the Central American States are now our logical markets for our manufactured products, as well as our best sources of raw materials. The meeting broke up with the most friendly relations established, and, in fact, this was the keynote of the entire visit. Both sides found that the others were not such bad people after all, and agreed that if more Mexicans visited this country and more North Americans visited theirs the most cordial relations of business and friendship would link the two countries firmly together.

SOME DANCE ALL DAY

The party was invited next day to a fête at the suburban home of the governor, where after arriving for early breakfast music was struck up and staid gentlemen from this city found themselves dancing for hours with many comely maidens of the town who had been invited to grace the occasion. Various of the Mexican dances were put on as exhibitions, and several singers who had mighty good voices, too, sang the rather sad songs of that section. Dinner was served later, and we were told, even after we had gone back "home" for a rest, the others danced all day. These people find our fox trot, one step, and waltz the most enjoyable, but as their own dances are considerably slower than ours, this music also was slowed down to a point where most of us found it difficult to keep going.

In the evening the mayor and municipal officers entertained at supper on the balcony of the city hall, overlooking a most beautiful plaza, such as is the center of every Latin town, with an orchestra indoors and a military band concert outside to beguile the time. Here, again, the most friendly relations were voiced, and the party left for bed with the most fervent wishes to be of help to those people.

Here I might digress to say something about the meals that were lavished upon us. Usually, upon sitting down to table, one could gauge the number of courses to come by the number of plates stacked before him, often three and four. But oftentimes one got fooled, for the waiters would whisk away plate after plate as the courses went by and slyly return several more plates. There was always a good soup, fish, several different meats, chicken, turkey, or duck, rice, and potatoes in plenty, various wines, salads, fruits, other sweets, and dessert, with coffee and smokes topping off a belt-stretching list.

THINK OF THIS

Also, though it be lese majesty, one could recount the list of liquors served; beer always, champagne frequently, white and red wines, a brandy of the country, which various members of the party long will remember as "habanero," other cordials and whiskies, till the round came back to beer and the feasted one forgot just which he was drinking.

The following day members of the party drifted around town inspecting various sights in which they were interested. There were shops where live 'gators became everything from puttees to belts and holsters, hatbands, and trunks. Woodworking shops where furniture to rival the best output of the United States was made from the 32 different cabinet woods that grow in the section. One of the most interesting visits made by the writer was to a primary school, a private institution, for the state has no money any more to aid education, much as it wants to. Here there were 400 as bright and pretty tots, from the first grade to the seventh, as one could find in our own schools, all industrially at work under the eyes of earnest young women teachers. Others visited a secondary law school, also a private institution, where a devoted principal is doing his best with few funds to start out his law students. It is a most unfortunate condition that no Federal funds are used to promote education, for, above all, the people need schooling.

SUGAR BY THE TON

The next day was devoted to a trip 30 miles farther upriver to inspect one of the largest, and said to be the oldest, plantations in the state. Here the cane was growing 15 to 18 feet high in a field that has been under intense growing for 63 years without fertilizer and with little cultivation. The cane is planted from 12 to 15 years and yields from 28 to 35 tons of sugar per acre. Other fields were producing up to 40 tons. The plantation had its own mill and a small refinery, where "plantation refined" sugar is sent to Yucatan, where it sells for 8 cents per pound. The grinding season starts in November and continues for seven months.

Cane here is afflicted to some slight extent by a borer worm, but not to any amount of damage, and was said not to harbor any diseases. The cane is allowed to flower, and we are told the growers get more sugar by this method.

BANDITS ACTIVE

The next day, after we had left, we were informed later, revolutionists, who are now little more than ordinary bandits, raided the plantation.

But that was nothing. The first evening in the country, we found later, one of the revolutionary leaders who had been caught that day was taken out in the near-by country, so as not to disturb our welcome, and shot.

Upon returning from this hacienda we returned to our river boat and at midnight started down the river, in company with the governor and a large retinue, to pay a visit to near-by Maya ruins. In the company was the governor's private orchestra, an honor never before falling upon any members of the party, I am sure. In fact, wherever we went we were fêted with music, at one time having a band, another military band, and the orchestra to tickle our ears.

Down the Grijalva, almost to Frontera, and up the Usumacinta we were taken, arriving at the small village of Monte Cristo late the second morning. Here various automobiles, loaded aboard at Villahermosa, were put ashore and the party was taken over a very rough trail to the village of Santo Domingo de Palenque, where we stopped for the night, before visiting the ruins. By this time we were in the near-by State of Chiapas, also Mexican territory, but very near to the Republic of Guatemala. The various river systems spread a network of usable rivers and streams across all this territory, consequently there are no roads to speak of. Nor are there railroads, and telephones are conspicuous by their absence. There is considerable attempt to link the country with telegraph lines, but what is sorely needed are good roads where creeks do not avail and several lines of rail in various sections. One of the first things Tabasco is planning to do is to start railroads through this territory, but the funds are sadly lacking.

SLEEP IN CORN BIN

The road, if it could be called such, which took us to this small town, owed its being to the operations of the International Petroleum Co., which has carted in much drilling equipment by using great caterpillar trucks. Consequently deep bogs occurred whenever the forest drew in upon the road, and the machines were mired so many times no one could keep count.

At Santo Domingo sleeping and hotel accommodations were at a premium. There just were not any. However, we were bunked for the night in a corn bin of a local storekeeper, a German gentleman.

At this town was found the ruins of an ancient church, no one of the inhabitants knowing how many centuries old, but now gone to decay and used as a barracks for the sad-looking soldiers. In the front of the church were two wonderfully carved slabs of limestone, taken from the ruins of Palenque, an ancient esoteric center of the Maya civilization of long ago, that was near by.

In the morning stiffened joints were limbered to clamber aboard a group of small native ponies, and a terrible trail was taken to visit the ruins, some 9 kilometers distant.

Several horses slipped on the muddy tree trunks that served for bridges, several riders were thrown, and two ponies went into the streams. How the riders managed to free them was a mystery to us.

A description of these ruins hardly fits in here, but it can be said they date far back into or before the early days of the Christian era, and mark what must have been somewhat like a secluded monastery where ancient high priests performed the mysteries of their religion. The party clambered up steep artificial pyramids upon which are situated various temple ruins, and down into dungeonlike tunnels that ran underneath, then returned as they had come. The cars were boarded at noon, and after another hard trip landed us at the boat side after dark, after a journey during which many breakdowns occurred and several members swore they had seen several of the fierce native tigers of that section.

The steamer took us back to Frontera by late the next morning, where we were again fêted, were guests of honor at another ball, and then started on the last lap back home at midnight.

There were no steamers in port, and despite the anxious efforts of the governor to get one or a Federal war vessel to take us to Vera Cruz, none was available. Therefore we started back as deck passengers of an ancient three-masted schooner, the Nachi Cocom. This boat, only 105 feet long and 23 feet wide, luckily had a powerful gasoline motor as auxiliary power.

BOAT IS CROWDED

Fortunately for us the sea was calm and we did not experience even a rain. For besides our own and the governor's party going to witness the inauguration of President Calles at Mexico City, there were several score of others. With only two cabin berths on the ship we were stretched out on deck for 30 hours.

Meals were served on deck, where there was not even space to move around in. But it was the very best that could be done, as Governor Garrido was a delightfully thoughtful host and was tireless in his efforts to see that we had as much comfort as could be secured on such a trip. We all feel like singing, when we think of him, "He is a jolly good fellow."

After a stop of several hours at Puerto Mexico, a free port destined for considerable development, especially since oil is exported there, the good ship finally landed us at Vera Cruz, where we were lucky enough to find a fruit boat on the eve of leaving for New Orleans.

Finding it impossible to accept the governor's kind invitation to be his guests as far as Mexico City, most of the party took reservations for home. Therefore, after bidding a cordial and friendly adieu to Gov. Tomas Garrido and many friends made on the trip, the party left that night on the Vaccaro steamer Yoro, landing at home Monday evening, November 24, after a little less than three weeks away.

The trip was most valuable in results to Tulane University and opened the eyes of the business men to the possibilities of commercial development in Tabasco. Plans have been formulated to start progress toward concrete work in this direction. These will be made public later.

The New Orleans Association of Commerce, made up of men who have won distinction in every walk of life, captains of industry, merchant princes, financial leaders, will do their part and blaze the way for closer, friendlier, and more profitable relations with our sister Republic. The big men, the tall men of our city are among the best friends Mexico has in the United States.

Let me close by saying that if there be any among the readers of this address who are blessed with the wanderlust, and who long for the spell and lure of the jungle and the sublime awe of beholding the mighty ruins of a gorgeous past in the history of people who thousands of years ago played out their part in the grand drama of American life, let him make the journey to the great and inspiring temples that are to-day the lonely sentinels of the valleys of silence that lie between the mountain peaks which they adorn. They stand serene and tranquil, far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, and when a visitor does step from the jungle to behold them he wonders whether inanimate things can speak unto each other. The birds of the air and the beasts of the jungle only appear to be there. Except the crickets chirp and the grass lark sings its sweet song and the monkeys in the great trees, in thrilling wild cries that are almost terrifying, send the word to distant tribes that a new animal, man, has invaded their home. But one feels that the Spirit of God moves over it all.

Three years have passed into eternity since I made that wonderful trip. But the temples of the now wilderness are as indelibly fixed and as vividly in my mind as if I were still standing among their ruins. And what ruins! Palaces still, whose giant architecture defies the constant stroke of time. The slabs removed from the sacred vaults where imperial rulers rested in silent glory by Cortez in his quest for gold seemed to have been broken but yesterday. Temples in which the serene and powerful priesthood were cloistered that they might the better promote the moral, intellectual, and physical welfare of a now vanished people whose economic superstructure rested on a wonderfully developed agricultural basis. There are some scenes so stupendous, so affecting, so saddening, as to choke with emotion and make description possible only to the loftiest genius.

Wet with tears and choking with heart sobs the last of the Mayos must have viewed these reminders of the days that are no more, of a glory that was of Greece, of a grandeur that was of Rome. They were conquered by other men, and they and their triumphs are one with yesterday. Given to peace, they learned too late that their wealth was an invitation to the lesser breeds without the law to trample them and their civilization out of existence.

So runs the scroll of human destiny,
Written in fire and blood and scalding tears,
Scrawled with wrecked hopes and blasted visions—
The weary record of ten thousand years.

The weary record of peoples and of kings
Of empire and of race,
Which unto the law that ruleth earthly things
In ruin yielded place.

Next year I shall go to Yucatan and dwell for a while with ghosts of those who were but are not. They and their kin, who made the outlying islands far more attractive than the Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence, with temples the ruins of which may be seen from the deck of any steamer bound for Port Barrios, the gateway to Guatemala and San Salvador. Let us move southward, but before doing so let us saunter a few days through the southern metropolis.

See America first has become almost shopworn. It is a bromide. It has probably lost all of the force and charm that it once had as a phrase. I will therefore try to pour old wine into new bottles. Journey down to New Orleans and see one of the most unique and attractive cities on the continent. As Webster said of Massachusetts, "There she stands." We of New Orleans say of the Crescent City that lies between and around the great crescent of the Mississippi River and the historic Lake Pontchartrain, which connects with Maurepas and Lake Borne, "There she lives"—lives a life so exquisitely charming that she is known to the thousands of visitors who have entered her portals as the city that care forgot. A Latin quarter that possesses all of the magnetic pull of Paris, Lisbon, and Madrid and the appeal of New York and San Francisco combined.

The lure of the Tropics is but a faint emotion when compared with the deep-seated thrill felt by those who have oft in the stilly night wandered down the silent streets of the Latin quarter under the fascinating effect of a moonlit sky. Within easy reach of the city are the old plantation homes that linger with one like a haunting melody. Some of the most historic spots on the continent are either within the city or just beyond its limits. Jackson Square, where was celebrated the great victory of Jackson over Pakenham, flanked by the famous Pontalbo buildings and the old cathedral, a replica of the Chapel at Versailles, with the Cabildo on the one side and its counterpart, the old archbishopric, on the other. Below the city are the Plains of Chalmette, on which was fought a battle that relieved the War of 1812 of its tragic failures and glorified American arms far beyond that of any other engagement in our history. Out of New Orleans runs steamers to Mexico and Central America. A four-day trip on palatial steamers will bring a visitor to old Vera Cruz, from where he can take the Mexican Central Railroad and in less than six hours climb almost 8,000 feet before making the level run into the magnificent City of Mexico with its cathedral, around which is clustered a history that is destined to become the background for the literature of the New World. Chapultepec Heights, the Pyramids, the great civilizations of remote times, evidenced by excavations right within the city; Madero Square, the famous opera house not yet completed, the wonderful squares and public buildings, the great museum with art treasures that attest the glories of Aztec Maya and antedating civilizations cling to the memory. From Mexico City may be easily reached innumerable points which for scenic grandeur have no parallel in Switzerland or the Austrian Alps. Or a traveler may take a ship with all of the conveniences which go with the first-class trans-Atlantic liners and move down to Port Barrios. There he will spend the day steaming by the wonders of Rio Dulce. The next morning he is off to Guatemala City. He may remain a few hours at Quirigua, and there in a jungle contemplate and muse over the ruins that were once the pillars of cathedrals, churches, and temples and art galleries that probably go as far back for their beginning as the day when the angels of the Lord entertained Abraham.

Right near is the justly celebrated and famed hospital service of the United Fruit Co. That institution has been of greater value to the Central Americas than any factor that has come into the life of a people who were going downhill rapidly during the last hundred years. That great hospital not only inaugurated and institutionalized the wonderful methods of sanitation and hygiene for the protection of the vast number of people who operate the great banana plantations of the company but has by its educational and welfare service and influence imparted to the whole country the tremendous value that lies in orderly and disciplined cleanliness, which, indeed, is next to godliness. American capital along these lines has been of incalculable benefit to the present generation of Central America—an advantage that will bestow blessings upon the future generations of those tropical countries. That company and other American companies have come to a people that were in a slough of despondency and in the direst poverty and agricultural misery as of good tidings of a great joy. Hundreds of thousands benefited directly and indirectly by the agricultural prosperity that has come from the endeavors of these great American institutions. Guatemala, with its wonderful cathedral and quaint Spanish life, adapted to the New World will remain with the visitor. But it is the trip to Antigua that is unforgettable.

Minister Holland is an unusually charming and gracious gentleman and, as my host, saw to it that I beheld the miracles of nature and the hand of the Almighty in the tremendous chiseling of the cavernous depths of the canyons, deep unto sublimity, and the mountain heights whose peaks dominate the landscape and may be seen for miles out on the bosom of the Pacific Ocean. Over the mountain roads, moving to and fro, were Indian men and women, boys and girls, and even children, with baskets on their heads and one in each hand. They moved in a slow run and made many miles in a day.

From far up in the mountain regions they came with produce to the markets in Guatamala City—not so much for the purpose of selling or exchanging their stores as to sit in the market place and talk over the traditions of their ancestors who are with the dust. And as it was before Romulus and Remus builded what was to become the Eternal City, to mention slightingly a woman's name in the market place is to create a feud which may last for several generations. Dead to the world but still in its midst may be said very accurately of Antigua, the old city that was rocked to its destruction by the terrific earthquake of 1776. The streets are as silent as the streets of Pompeii and Herculeneum that are just beginning to feel the sunlight that they have not known for nigh on to 1,900 years. There were 40 churches in that old city, each of which would be equal to the finest ecclesiastical edifice of to-day, except possibly any of the great cathedrals of the world; and the three cathedrals whose ruins attest an architectural conception and workmanship never surpassed are in each instance larger than most of the great temples of religion that are standing to-day. Neither the Grand Canyon nor the Coliseum excite the mind with such reflections as the mournful silence of these cathedrals, churches, abbeys, and public buildings. Lonely, ghostly, they seem to accentuate and deepen the stillness that at times glooms over the broad seas. Ruins which suggest that in the fullness of time all things must pass away.

> The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Aye all which it inherits, shall dissolve
> And like this insubstantial pagent faded—
> Leave not a wrack behind.
> We are such stuff as dreams are made of
> And our little lives are rounded with a sleep.

What a wonderful past these ruins suggest, what memories are aroused in the contemplation of them. Involuntarily one recalls the lines:

> A land without ruins is a land without memories—a land without memories is a land without history. A land that wears a laurel crown may be fair to see, but twine a few sad cypress leaves around the brow of any land, and be that land barren, beautiless, and bleak, it becomes lovely in its consecrated coronet of sorrow and wins the sympathy of the heart and of history. Crowns of roses fade; crowns of thorns endure. Calvaries and crucifixions take deepest hold on humanity. The triumphs of might are transient; they pass and are forgotten. The sufferings of right are graven deepest on the chronicles of nations.

I once heard the late Senator Lodge and the late orator Bourke Cockran in a colloquy agree that Ireland and Central America, during a period of less than 100 years, had lost more than half of what their population were nearly a century ago. In the case of Ireland, the emigration upon such a tremendous scale was the result of economic conditions which drove millions to the Americas and Australia. In the case of the Central Americas, earthquakes and revolutions scattered more than half of the people and forced them into South America and back to Europe from which all of our ancestors came. I have always thought that it was an historical fallacy to assume that Spanish conquistadores sent their loot and pillage over the Atlantic Ocean to fill the coffers of Spain. The evidence is entirely to the contrary. The conquistadores sent to Spain for artisans, architects, builders, and materials in order to construct the great buildings, the ruins of which may be seen all over Mexico and Central America. No doubt they paid for the marble and statuary which went into the great public structures and for the services rendered by the constructors out of the gold which was wrested from Aztec and Inca. Yes, my friends, see America first. There is a story in each of the middle Americas, a romance that explains the lure of the Tropics.

Miles and miles of banana plantations. Banana trees, with their great fronded leaves that scarcely conceal the huge bunches of fruits that nestle among them. Fruit trains that run to ship side from plantations miles and miles away and up in the highlands coffee haciendas. Make the trip. You will probably find something richer than that which you went in search of, and just as the Argonauts under Jason brought home knowledge more valuable than the golden fleece you will, in addition to memories that will never fade, add to your store of information and wisdom. You will understand and better appreciate the problem of the Americas and our own obligations and responsibilities.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read to the end of line 21 on page 3.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Oscawana Democratic Club, of Queens County, New York City, N. Y., indorsing the stand of Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON in favoring religious tolerance, which were ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate cablegrams from the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Cablegram]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 14, 1928.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Upon the opening of the legislature this senate this day on which the birth of the liberator and martyr President is being celebrated, remembering his memorable sentence, "The Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth," unanimously resolved to ask you to apply these words to our island through the enactment of the bills introduced by our Resident Commissioner providing for the election of the Governor of Porto Rico by the vote of the people at the elections of 1932 and authorizing our people to draft their own constitution.

ANTONIO R. BARCELO,
President of the Senate of Porto Rico.

[Cablegram]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 13, 1928.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

This house at the opening of its sessions on this day when the birth of the liberator and martyred President is celebrated wishes to remind you of his memorable sentence, "The Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth." Porto Rico demands that the principles involved in those words be applied to our island in the form of public institutions recommending to Congress approval of bills introduced by our Resident Commissioner providing the election of the Governor of Porto Rico by the vote of her people at the elections of 1932 and enabling our people to formulate our own constitution, thus acting in accordance with the several memorials presented to Congress by our legislative assembly.

JOSE TOUS SOTO,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:
